The team claims that there was a conspiracy to freeze him out of the establishment. In his petition he alleges that he was the principal originator of the partnership scheme, which was started in 1889, and was run without interruption also refor four years, the gross profits in that period being $50,000. After an account of sales had been made in 1893, he says, the conspiracy was formed by the defendants to get him out, and with that end in view an invoice was taken, which was made to show that there had been a loss of $19,000 that year. Fowler represented that the business was out, and with that end in view an involce was taken, which was made to show that there had been a loss of $19,000 that year. He tried to show that she had not been suffering so severely from her physical injuries that she was unable to attend picnics, parties and other like places, and the witness admitted that she had not.

The testimony during the afternoon session was less interesting. Several physicians were put upon the stand, who had made an examination of her injuries. The air was redolent with necrosis, nodules and indura-tions. Considerable time was also occupied in finding out how much the physicians knew about the difference between ostitis and peri-ostitis. Both attorneys and witnesses managed to get themselves hopelessly entangled in a network of big words, and the court gone through the customs house. It is a reporter's fist was stricken with lockjaw.
