BOTH COMBATANTS APPLAUDED.

A scattering burst of applause greeted this. A scattering burst of appliads givets the mr. Breckinridge took his seal. The house sat breathlessly awaiting for the reply. Mr. Heard appeared to be calm, but he was also evidently laboring under great excitement. Not once in his long congressional career, he began, had he been embroiled in a personal controversy on the floor of the house. Mr. Heard then explained the situation.

card then explained the situation. Today, he said, had been set apart for Dis-ict of Columbia business, and he had felt It his duty when the opposing leaders on the Hawaiian resolution had finished their state-ments to demand the previous question. The gentleman from Kentucky had then hurried over to him and had stated in a tone which he regarded as an insult that the house would do no business today. He had thereupon de-manded the yeas and nays, as he deemed it his duty to do, whereupon the gentleman from Kentucky, in what he regarded as most offensive language, had called him an inso-"He followed," said Mr. Heard, his temper

Heard.

"After my disclaimer the gentleman still insists I said it," retorted Mr. Breckinridge, again flaring up, "I withdraw it; he does not

Mr. Heard hastily denied that he intended to question Mr. Breckinridge's veracity, but stated that he meant that in his excitement the gentleman from Kentucky had forgotten what he did say.

"I stated," he continued, "that the gentleman lied. Upon his withdrawal of his offen-sive epithet, I will withdraw mine, but not before. I believe that I have done nothing which it was not my duty and right to do." Mr. Heard was also applauled when he took his seat. This ended the wordy combat, and, in the absence of a motion which might have been made to repri-mand the principals in the af-fair, the house proceeded with the question before it, and the excitement soon subsided, although there was much speculation throughout the day as to what would be the outcome Mr. Perry of Kentucky, a friend of both Breckinridge and Heard, was using his good offices after the row toward reconciliating them.
