BONE AND BLUBBER HUNTERS.

Rise and Decline of the New edford Whaling Industry. The Evening Standard of New Bedford in a special issue gives a review of the whaling industry of that port, from which the following interesting extracts are taken:

Probably New Bedford owes her prosperity more to the whaling industry than to anything else. There are logbooks showing whaling voyages from here as early as 1761, and in 1765 Russell and Taliman owned four vessels in the pursuit. In 1805 New Bedford owned seventy-three ships and thirty-nine brigs. In that year sixteen returned with a catch valued at over $700,000. The war of 1812 put an effectual damper on the booming industry, however, and for four or five years a decided decrease occurred. In 1811 the catch was $1 180,494.96; in 1812, $529,120; in 1813. $180,167.85, and in 1815 only $71,522.01. From thirteen arrivals in 1810 the business dropped American rights were acknowledged in 1815 things began to boom steadily. In 1817 thir-teen arrived, with a catch of over $1,000,000. In 1820 there were twenty-eight arrivals n 1830 forty-six, in 1840 eighty-two and in It was between 1850 and 1857 that whaling was at its zenith. There were from 310 to 320 vessels then engaged, with a tonnage of from 104,000 to 110,000. Their catch ranged in value from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, with an average of about $9,500,000, an immense part of which was profit. As whaling boomed, so did everything else. In 1851 alone forty-eight vessels were added to the fleet, most of them built at home or its imnediate vicinity. Blacksmiths, caulkers, rig. gers, sailmakers, ship carpenters and al other artisans naturally ailied to ship inter ests were in great demand and found plenty of work at high wages, As an example of the way things in New Bedford boomed financially, it may be interesting to say that in 1852, in one contract, the government bought 75,000 gallons of sperm oil at $1.18% per gallon. And that was a fair sample of the market. There was always a demand and at good prices, which yielded a big profit, The aggregate of population jumped up by the thousands. In 1850 it was 16,000 and in

To show the immense profits of whaling, few cases are cited. In 1850 the ship Envoy, fitted out at a cost of $8,000, brought in a catch valued at $138,000. In 1852 the Saratoga landed $124,000 after a voyage of thirtythree months. In 1853 the Montreal, thirty-two months, landed $136,023.19. 1866 the ships Corinthian and George How and each brought in catches of $250,000 It is said that in four years on investments of $25,000, each of these ships netted $125. 000, a profit of 125 per cent per year. In 1867 the ship Commodore Morris in thirty months took $192,000. As late as 1886 the bark Europa brought in a catch valued at $248,000. With such profits as these it is little wonder that New Bedford became rich. Her imports from whaling from 1840 to 1860 aggregated $160,410,255.28. Imagine all this wealth pouring into New Bedford, into one little town, with an average population of 18,000 people. In the year 1857 the New Bedford whaling industry was at its height, there being in that year in the fleet 329 vessels of all kinds. with a tonnage of 1Fl,364, and requiring crews agregating 10,000 men, representing an investment of about $12,000,000. The value of the catch of oil and bone in that year was $6,178,728, and these figures have never was $6.178.728, and these figures have never since been equaled. The most valuable catch of oil and bone by one ship in one voyage was made by the Onward, hailing from, and owned in, New Bedford, Edward W. Howland, agent, Captain William H. Allen of Groton, Conn. which arrived in port in 1866. It brought about $275,000—a most magnificent sum. Captain Allen's part amounted to $33,000. ... The voyage was of forty-one months' duration. Then came the civil war, with the havoc caused by the confederate Alabama and Shenandoah. No less than forty New Bedford whalers were captured and burned or bonded by these piratical maranders. Close following the end of the war came, in 1871, a dreadful disaster in the Arctic, in which thirty-four more vessels were lost. Five vegra later ten more sels were lost. Come, now, let's see what you're made of!" In some way this lordly promise got adrift the current of country gossip, and roused the admirers of Isabel one and all to new interest in the contest. Large stories were told of the late hours the judge kept that winter with Isabel's sultors.

Clint Holderman drove over to the brick house early on the evening that he had set the his mind, with flint-like determination, to give his father's advice the trial. It was a cold night, and as he sped along in his new cutter, drawn by a handsome

He had spent many evenings of the wince, her love, and he knew that his mother had playing chess with the judge, so he was sure her love, and he knew that his mother had been hardly won.

It was a bright winter morning. Before all this. He thought of the hour, when at last with his heart and understanding touched, the judge would bid them good night and he should be left alone with Isabel.

There was no handsomer young man in the country than Clint Holderman, none who danced better, or who drove better horses, but more than all this the judge had repeatedly told him that he had never known a man who played a better hand at chess.

This was an encouragement indeed, for if the judge had a weakness it was for chess, and it would be decidedly pleasant to have a son-in-law who could be to him such a ready source of entertainment. As he drove into the yard the judge came out on the side piazza.

"Good evening," he called out, "just drive on to the barn; the man will put out your horses." One of the farm hands came out stable as he spoke, and Clint threw him the reins and followed the judge into the house "Snapping cold, but splendid sleighing, the judge said, while Clint was pulling off his overcoat in the hall.

"Yes, I believe my ears are touched," Clint 'Isabel is popping some corn. She'll be glad you happened over to help eat it."

He led the way into the long sitting room at the end of the hall. Isabel was or her knees before an open wood are shaking a corn popper. The white kernels snapped and expanded with a pleasant sound.

The lamp had not been lit, but the firelight made the room light and cosy. 'Isabel, here is Mr. Holderman, my dear.' She sprang up. "I didn't hear you come in. Good evening Come over here by the fire. Why, it's Clint! she said, as he came into the glow.

"I'm sure I never think of you as Miss Hilton," he said, plunging his hand into the corn, and laughing. "That would be a little too much ike strangers, as long as we've known each other. The judge cleared his throat. "I have always decidedly disliked the informality of country people in calling every one by their Christian names," he said. "It leaves no degree in intimacy. But I suppose it is impossible to know where to draw the Isabel went back and knelt before the fire again. "Oh, I don't know," she said, shaking the popper vigorously. "As long as it is a cus-tom I don't think anyone feels it a mark of special intimacy, and so the custom is pro-tected by being a custom." The young man sat awkwardly in his chair and was silent. They seemed to be closing the against any thought he might have of closer intimacy with the family.

The judge left the room for a moment and came back with a lighted lamp and placed it on the claw-legged table in the center of the room. He had put on a long dressing gown, faced with crimson quilted slik, and now he drew his great chair up before the fire and stretched himself out in it.

"Come, Mr. Holderman, I will let you shake the popper for me, and I'll go down cellar and get some apples." Isabel looked at him with a merry twinkle in her eyes as she held the handle towards him and then ran out of the room.

Clint grasped the handle of the popper with the delight of success flooding his veins. Isabel had never before given him reason to believe that she cared for him, that compare with that look.

Daylight would find him sitting right there, but he would beat the judge's watch and gain the opportunity of speaking to her! It was a delightful evening. The judge par-took of the pop corn and the conversation was more than usually affable and entertaining. Isabel sat on the opposite side of the fire-place and crocheted on a blue wool scarf. There were pink spots burning her cheeks.

The time passed on until the noisy clock on the mantel clearly and forcibly announced the hour of 10.

It had been comparatively easy this far, but now was the time when Clint usually went The real contest was about to begin.

The judge shoved his chair back to the table, picked up a paper and began to read.

From time to time he glanced over the top of his paper at the two talking before the fire, but still read on.

When the clock struck 11 he threw the paper down, pulled his chair back to the fire and drew the young man into an ani-mated political discussion. Isabel stirred about the room, correctly putting things in order for the night.

It was nearly midnight. For the last fif-

The judge was New England born and bred. There is a veneration for Puritan ancestry in the entirely western soul that the Puritan mind still clings to for good old English blood.

Isabel Hilton was her father's houselesser.

At a quarter past 12 the judge stood up.
