Can I Be Beautiful?

Yes! Mme. M. Yale has discovered the secret by which everyone may become pleas-ing and attractive. Nothing so detracts from the appearance of men and women as thin, faded or partially gray hair. Your creator never intended gray hairs to come at forty or fifty, and scarcely at sixty. Warry or hard work or the demands of society have caused those wintry threads to appear un-bidden amid your soft, brown hair, or in the wavy tresses that once rivaled the raven's wing. These changes come so quickly that they startle one. But relief is at hand.

Yale's Hair Tonic

Will speedily and permanently restore gray hair to its natural color. You can use it with perfect confidence, as it is harmless to the hair, and at the same time the most complate restorative ever discovered. It will restore faded or gray hair to its original color and vigor, and place your features in a frame-work of beautiful natural hair, without which no face, however fair, can be called atiful.

We have on display the most Beautiful Stock of Furniture in Nebraska.

Among our late studies in old French furniure is this Chiffonniere, with its double swell front and its antique prow-like supports to the mirror. It makes a very beautiful piece of furniture, executed in Bird's-Eye Maple or Curly Birch, and with trimmings of polished brass in Eighteenth Century designs.

These 1895 patterns mean nothing until you stop to recall the fact that they were all esigned in the early days of the business depression when low price was the first and last consideration. They are simply "studies In Economy," and such values may not reappear in the furniture business in the next half dozen years. If you have a single furniture need, supply

Mrs. Allingham laughs to herself in a strange way. "Well, I have done something," says she, and then the thought, "I can save others; myself I cannot save," to the terrace and is coming toward them. His slep is not altogether steady. He is sufficiently himself, however, to be able to take in the situation at a glance, and there is maleyelence and a distinct enformer of the situation at a glance, and there is maleyelence and a distinct enformer of the situation at a glance, and there is maleyelence and a distinct enformer of the situation at a glance, and there is maleyelence and a distinct enformer of the situation at a glance, and there is maleyelence and a distinct enformer of the situation at a glance, and there is maleyelence and a distinct enformer. would have given way to tears. "So bad as that?"
"For one thing, he is married."

"Good heavens! married, and-" "Yes; he has evidently pursued her here. You can see how profty she is."

"Well-from Berlin to here he has fol-"He's no sense of decency, then."

"He was born, no doubt, without that troublesome sense."
"And his wife?" "She-lift him some time ago."

"A mistake," saya he, indifferently. He is really hardly thinking of what he is saying, but his tone coming on her quickened mood is as a touch upon a wound. "You think, then, that a woman should cleave-that," bitterly, "is the scriptural term, isn't it?—to the most contemptible of God's creatures until her heart is utterly broken and her spirit and body have lost their beauty, just because a clergyman has said a few words over her and him?" "Not at all. Only until the law has set her free. There is always the divorce court, you know. An admirable institution, if considerably wanting in some ways. This chance acquaintance of yours must be a contemptible fellow. I must say I despise most heartily the man or woman who under false colors makes love or permits it to be made,

"Tomorrow you shall take me." But let us leave this stupid subject. What has it got to do with us, my dearest?"

"Why, nothing, nothing!" a little wildly,
"Of course not. Then, why waste time over ot. You have wasted a good deal over Miss Amy. Do you know," with a fond laugh, "I feel a little jealous of her? You have behaven like an angel of light to her. You let us hope," with a shrug, "she will profit by it. But now—give something to me!" "Ah!" The cry is low, but piercing. To him it speaks only of love, and love, indeed, is its dominant note; but in it there is despair, too, and anguish, and memories of the past—the dreadful past that, in spite of all one's mental narcotics, can never be wholly put to sleep. Passionately she representations of the put to sleep. Passionately she represents the start of the property of the start of the st ut to sleep. emisphere divided them from those in the com inside. "Tomorrow, Clare!" breathes he. She shudders in his embrace. "Why, Clare! What is it? That girl has upset you! You are thinking of your past marriage. But it is past, my darling, my beloved! Nothing of it re-mains. You have told me something of it, and I have guessed the rest. It"—he pauses, bending over her—"it was a martyrdom."

"It was hell!" says she in a hourse, stifled pressed against his. whisper. It shocks him, but quite suddenly her mood changes. She lifts herself and quickly, vehemently presses her lips to his The caress is feverish, and yet when he would have strained her to his heart, she puts him back from her, lightly, laughingly, with both hands, then sinking into a low chair, beckens him to her. It is past, and done with. And tomorrow"— She threw back her lovely head and laughs alond, "Temorrow, you will take me away-away-

"What is it, darling?" says Carlton, anxiously. Her manner seemed forced, unreal. "Oh, nothing," impatiently, "But Constantinople is far away, isn't it?" "From this? Well, pretty far. But," in a troubled tone, "there is something the matter with you tonight. I can see it in Your conversation with that silly girl has been too much for you. I shan't allow any interviews of that kind again. You are mine now, my love, mine." There is a ring of true triumph in his voice It restores her. Once again her spirit flashes

"It is a lie!" says he, vehemently, looking "Deny it!"

She, too, has risen,
"It is the truth," says she, in a dying tone,
"Leave me now," She looks full at him, and he can see that her eyes are brilliant with pain, her lips—her dear lips, white.

"Later on I will explain. But go now-go!" The voice des away. It is midnight. Upon the terrace Carlton paces up and down with but one thought in his mind. To see her, to upbraid her, to leave her. For a moment he rests by the railings, and even as he does so he finds her beside him. She
