(Copyright, 1895.) banks and insurance offices from which Hewitt held a sort of general retainer as detective adviser, in fulfillment of which he was regularly consulted as to the measures to be taken in different cases of fraud, forgery, theft and so forth, which it might be the misfortune of the particular firms to encounter. The more important and intricate of these cases were placed in his portant companies of the sort was the General Guarantee society, an insurance corporation which, among other risks, took forth?" those of the integrity of secretaries, clerks and cashiers. In the case of a cash-box elopement on the part of any person guaranteed by the society the directors were naturally anxious for a speedy capture he culprit, and more especially of the booty, before too much of it was spent, in order to lighten the claim upon their funds, and in work of this sort Hewitt was at times engaged, either in general advice and directions, or in the actual pursuit of the plunder and the plunderer.

Arriving at his office a little later than usual one morning Hewitt found an urgent message awaiting him from the General Guarantee society, requesting his attention to a robbery which had taken place on the previous day. He had gleaned some hint of the case from the morning paper, wherein appeared a short paragraph which ran thus:

"SERIOUS BANK ROBBERY."

"In the course of yesterday a clerk employed by Messrs. Liddle, Neal & Liddte, the well known bankers, disappeared, having in his possession a large sum of money, the and the plunderer.

his possession a large sum of money, the property of his employers—a sum reported to be rather over £15,000. It would seem that he had been intrusted to collect the money in his capacity of 'walk-elerk' from

A large number of the notes which he received had been cashed at the Bank of England before suspicion was aroused. We understand that Detective In-Eastern Consolidated when one of them came pector Plummer of Scotland Yard has the case in hand." The clerk, whose name was Charles William Laker, had, it appeared from the message, been guaranteed in the usual way by the the man's apprehension and the recovery of, at any rate, as much of the booty as possible. A smart hansom brought Hewitt to Threadneedle street in a bare quarter of an hour, and there a few minutes' talk with the manager, Mr. Lyster, put him in possession of the main facts of the case, which appeared o be simple. Charles William Laker was 5 years of age and had been in the employ Messrs. Liddle, Neal & Liddle for some hing more than seven years-since he left school, in fact-and until the previous day there had been nothing in his conduct to complain of. His duties as walk clerk consisted in making a certain round, beginning at about half past 10 each morning. There were a certain number of the more important banks between which and Messra. Liddle, Neal & Liddle there were daily transactions and a few smaller semi-private banks and merchant firms acting as financial agents with whom there was business intercourse of less importance and regularity, and each of these, as necessary, he visited in turn, collecting cash due on bills and other instruments of the like nature. He carried a wal-let, fastened securely to his person by a chain, and this wallet contained the bills and the cash. Usually, at the end of his round, when all his bills had been converted into cash, the wallet held very large sums. His work and responsibilities, in fine, were those common to walk clerks in all banks.

On the day of the robbery he had started On the day of the robbery he had started out as usual—possibly a little carlier than was customary—and the bills and other securities in his possession represented considerably more than £15,000. It had been ascertained that he had called in the usual way at each establishment on his round, and way at each establishment of his r and punished. Therefore, Hewitt and Mr. Lyster, as soon as might be, made for Messrs. Liddle, Neal & Liddle's, that the investigation might be begun.

The bank premises were quits near—in and Mr. Lyster made their way to the firm's private rooms. As they were passing an outer waiting room Hewitt noticed two women. One, the elder, in widow's weeds, was sitting with her head bowed on her hands over a small writing table. Her face was not visible but her whole attitude was was not visible, but her whole attitude was that of a person overcome with unbearable grief, and she sobbed quietly. The other was a young woman of 22 or 23. Her thick, black vell revealed no more than that her features were small and regular and that her face was pale and drawn. She stood with a hand on the elder woman's shoulder and she quickly turned her head away as the two men entered, Mr. Neal, one of the partners, received them in his own room. "Good morning, Mr. Hewitt," he said, when Mr. Lyster introduced the detective. "This is a serious business—very. I think I am sorrier for Lakawhimself than for anybody clae, ourselves included—or, at any rate, I am sorrier for his mother. She is waiting now to see Mr. Liddle as soon as he arrivas—Mr. Liddle has known the family for a long time. Miss Shaw is with her, too, poor girl. She is a quickly turned her head away as the two

"Yes." Mr. Neal replied; "in fact, he's here now, going through the centents of Laker's desk, and so forth; he thinks it possible Laker may have had accomplices. Will you see him?"

"Presently. Inspector Plummer and I are old friends. We met last, I think, in the case of the Stanway cameo, some months ago. But first, will you tell me how long Laker has been a walk-clerk?" has been a walk-clerk?"
"Barely four months, although he has been hands entirely, with separate commissions, with us altogether seven years. He was in the usual way. One of the most imning of the year." "Do you know anything of his habits-what he used to do in his spare time, and so

"Not a great deal. He went in for boating, I believe, though I have heard it whis-pered he had one or two more expensive tastes—expensive, that is, for a young man in his position," Mr. Neal explained, with a dignified wave of the hand that he peculiarly affected. He was a stout old gentleman, and the gesture suited him.

You have no reason to suspect him of dishonesty before, I take it?"
"Oh, no. He made a wrong return once, believe, that went for some time undeclerical error-a mere clerical error.

"Do you know anything of his associates out of the office?" "No: how should 1? I believe Inspector Plummer has been making inquiries as to that, however, of the other clerks. Here he is, by the bye, I expect. Come in." It was Plummer who had knocked, and he ame in at Mr. Neal's call. He was a m came in at Mr. Neal's call. He was a middle-aged, small-eyed, impenetrable looking man, as yet of no great repu-tation in the force. Some of my readers may remember his connection with that case, so long a public mystery, that I have else-where fully set forth and explained under the title of "The Stanway Cameo Mystery." Plummer carried his billycock hat in one hand and a few maners in the other. He hand and a few papers in the other. He gave Hewitt good merning, placed his hat on a chair, and spread the papers on the table. "There's not a great deal here," he said, "but one thing's plain-Laker has been bet-See here, and here, and here"-he took a few letters from the bundle in his hand-'two letters from a bookmaker about settling (wonder he trusted a clerk), several telegrams from tipaters, and a letter from some friend, only signed by initials, asking Laker to put a sovereign on a horse for a friend with his own. I'll keep these, I think. It may be worth while to see that friend, if we can find him. Ah, we often find it's betting, don't we, Mr. Hewitt? M anwhile there's

"You are sure that is where he has gone?" asked Hewitt. "Well, I'll tell you what we've done us yel: First, of course, I went round to all the banks. There was nothing to be got from that. The cashiers all knew him by sight, and one was a personal friend of his. He had called as usual, said nothing in particular, cashed his bills in the ordinary way and finished up at the Eastern Consolidated bank at about 1:15. So far there was nothing whatever. But I started two or three man, meanwhile, making inquiries at the railway stations, and so on. I had scarcely left the after me with news. He had tried Palmer's tourist office, although that seemed an unlikely place, and there struck the track."

"Had he been there?"
"Not only had he been there, but he had taken a tourist ticket to France. It was quite General Guarantee society, and Hewitt's presence at the office was at once desired, in order that steps might quickly be taken for what you like; you have the choice of two or three different routes to begin with, and you can break your journey where you please and make all sorts of veriations. So that a man with a ticket like that and a few hours' start could twist about on some remote branch route and strike off in another direction allogether with a new ticket for some out-of-the-way place while we were ascertained that he had called in the usual way at each establishment on his round, and had transacted his business at the last place by about a quarier past 1, being then, without doubt, in possession of cash to the full value of the bills negotiated. After that, Mr. Lyster said, yesterday's report was that nothing more had been a message to the effect that he had been a message to the effect that he had been traced out of the country—to Calais, at least, it was thought. The directors of the society wished Hewitt to take the case in hand personally and at once, with a view of recovering what and at once, with a view of recovering what —ten minutes. The clerk at Palmer's re-was possible from the plunder by way of membered the time, because he was anxious salvage; also, of course, of finding Laker, for to get out to his lunch, and kept looking at it is an important moral gain to guarantee societies as an example if a thief is caught and punished. Therefore, Hewitt and Mr. way of luggage, I fancy. We inquired careremember the passengers for whom they had The bank premises were quite near—in Leadenhall street—and, arrived there.
