see that the man was ill at ease and like me that strives to put off an evil day. Nevertheless we lighted down at the change house and tied our horses to the ring of the door post. When we had seated ourselves Sir James called for ale, and was exceedingly merry, but not (as I thought) in the wisest way, seeing that he was so close to his own door, and his wife certain to hear of it on the morning. Then he cried for the chiler maid of the Then he cried for the chief maid of the two that were James Marr's daughters, and declared that he would find a match for her, swearing that she was too well looking to be going about breeding quarrels and making ill-blood among the lads.

"Never yet did I get the chance to say yea or nay. Umphray Spurway. But 'tis better late than never," said the lass Elspie, speaking from the doorway where Sir James had stayed her. She was a brisk lass, with no ill in her that ever I saw.

"Well, listen here Elspie," cried the Englishman, daffing with her, "tell us all whether you will have me, or my man Henry Bowman that is a limber lad and likely of his face?"

"For a married man or for a lad to court?" asked the lass, looking from one to the other.

"For a married man, of course," said Sir James, before the Englishman had time to speak.

"Then I choose Umphray Spurway, the Englishman," said she, "Bonny faces make bare downsittings."

"A wise less," said Sir James; "ye couldnad to better, Umphray."

But even as he spoke I saw his jaw drop and he stared at the door at which appeared to his feet and set his hand to his sword. The face of the young man who had pursued to his feet and set his hand to his sword. The face of the young man was flushed with wrath or wine. I know not which.

What more he would have said I know net, but the woman broke out furbusly upon him, asking who he was that he should take her good name, saying that she was an honest man's wife and much else.

"Said ye 'an honest man's honest wife?" said Sir James. And he looked very direct at her as she spoke.

The woman turned away as if she could not bear the question and the eyes of all that her in the house. She made as though she would go to the fireside, by which said James Marf's wife, with her daughter Eisple standing beside her. But they gathered the skirts of their kirtles about them and swept off into an inner room. So the woman came back shamelacedly to the side of her paramour, who stood browbeating us all, saye the Englishman, who speed contentedly at his ale, and smilling in a way that was a vast admiration to me to behold. I knew not whether indeed I should see him again, I rose from my place and exhorted him to repent and put away his sin, for that his father was ready to forgive and receive him again, as in the days before his first going from home.

"Out upon you, canting hound?" he cried, breaking in on me; "I tell you plainly, gir I had as muckle as sixpence in the day, it would never trouble my father more."

car in his nature. It is, I well believe, born in a man's blood, and he hath no more to de with it than with who was his father. Yet mark the great crying that there has been in all ages about brave men and valiant men, and men that have never known fear. Yet what credit is there in such like. They cannot help it more than I could help having an eye that had a cast in it (if such like I had), or red hair, or a nose turned up at the end like that of a wild Eironach. Yet such men come to honor, and their sons inherit it. For this also is the folly of the times.
