CHAPTER III.

Oh, the dreary wastes left by the loved bered Jamie Lauder, and he turned the conwho have deserted us! These are the vacant places of life which we water with bitterest tears. Had Sophy died Andrew would have tears. Had Sophy died Andrew would have vented her naming to him.

Said: "It is the Lord; let Him do what After eating some bread and cheese with seemeth right in His sight." It was the seemeth right in His sight." It was the the women Andrew went to his room. The manner and the means of his loss which storm he had foreseen was then raging around manner and the means of his loss which filled him with a dumb rage and sorrow, for in spite of his mother's and sister's anger he the rocks with a keen, lashing sound. The would say or do nothing likely to give Sophy mother and daughter hardly heard it; they sat the slightest trouble or notoriety. He remained in his room or took a boat and went alone on the sea, but he made no complaint, and though the village was ringing with gossip concerning Sophy, not man or woman cry, loud and plercing, and quite distinct from ventured to name her in Andrew's presence. It came from Andrew's room, and the women Janet Binnie described as "an ill man to live wi', a man out o' his senses and falling away from his meat and his clothes."

For two weeks this misery continued without abatement, and Janet's and Christina's entered. Andrew supported himself against came up to the Binnie cottage and brought with her two cards tied together with a bit of silver wire. They were Sophy's wedding cards, and she had sent also an Edinburg paper containing a notice of her marriage to Archibaid Braelands. The ceremony had taken place in St. Andrew's church and the women remembered the scheme of the chest of drawers, his countenance was pale and distraught, and a quiet fury burned in his eyes. He made several attempts to speak ere he was able to ejaculate: "The siller! It is a gane!" "Gene!" cried Christina. "That is just impossible!" ."It is a' gane!" Mists, vague and trou bled as the background of dreams were or bled as the background of dreams were on the horizon, and there was a feeling of mel-ancholy in the air. But she liked the damp, fresh wind, with its taste of brine, and she drew her plaid round her, and breathed it with a sense of enjoyment. Andrew came to her side and said: "Chr'stina, I got a letter today and I am going about the business I told you of. I'll start early in the morning; sae put up what I'll need in the wee bag, and say naething to mother till a' things are set-tied. I told her I was going about a new tied. "Your brother is a' right now. Andrew there was no time for visiting. Jamie was no time for visiting. Jamie was so sure of this that he did not even ask permission to run up to Pittencraigie. To have done so would have been to ask for his discharge, and he wrote and told Christina the position in the most loving and sensible man-ner. She believed him fully, and was satisfied, yet she felt ashamed to tell Andrew, and when she did so his answer gave her a dcuble heartache. "Nae wonder he keeps awa" from Pitteneraigie," he said, with a scornful laugh. "He'll come here nae mair, unless he is made to. And if it wasna for you and your mide have. Christian I would

"Do you say I took it? mind your words, man!" and went back to his fishing hoat. And in the home he made them feel that everything but the barest necessities were not to be but the barest necessities were not to be thought of. All of Christina's little extravagances of bridal preparations were peremptorily stopped. There would be no silk wedding gown now, if there would be a wedding at all. For Andrew's continual suspicions had an influence she fought in vain against, especially as Jamie did not come to Pitten craigie after the second or third voyage.
Then people began to talk and to wonder and to ask embarrassing questions, and aron there was a shake of the head and a sigh of pity when Christina was mentioned. So four wretched months went by, and then one moonlight night in February Christina heard the quick footstep and the joyous whisheard the quick rootstep and the joyous whis-tile she knew so well. She stood up trembling with happiness, and as Jamie flang wide the door, she fled to his arms. For some mo-ments he saw nothing, and cared for nothing, but the girl clasped to his heart, but as she hears, to soh he looked at Janet who had began to sob he looked at Janet, who had purposely gone to the china rack, that she might have her back to him; and then at Andrew, who stood white and stern, with "Whatever is the matter, Andrew?" he red. AFTER LANCASTER OFFICIALS. Will Be Charged with Sending Paupers Into Douglas County. John Stehlek called on the county commissioners yesterday. He came with a pocket full of recommendations and the backing of Draws a Cheek on a Bank in Which several of the big counties of Nebraska, but left without getting a ticket to New York City at the expense of Douglas county. Commissioner Jenkins not only refused the request, but says that he will bring a criminal action against Lancaster county officials for shipping Stehlek into Omaha. Stehlek is an ill-starred father of eight hungry children. Unable to make a living in Saunders county, he says the officials of that county sent him to Lincoln. At Lincoln he says the county kindly procured him a ticket over the B. & M. to Omaha, where they told him that he would find friends innumerable. Steblek tells a puffet to for they told him that he would find friends innumerable. Stehlek tells a pitiful tale of having fed his children on dry bread and water for some days past.

Again Christina rose, and again her mother interfered. "You will go your lane, Jamie Lauder. I dinna ken whether you are right or wrang. I ken naething about that weary siller. But I do ken there hae been naething but trouble since Andrew saved you from the sea. I'm no saying it is your fault, but the sea has been against us ever since, and noo you'll go awa' and you'll stay awa'."

"Christina! Am I to go?"

"Go, Jamie, but I'll come to you and there is nane shall keep me from you."

"Again Christina rose, and again her mother congregation began to gossip.

Several weeks ago some one told Spencer that his wife and the preacher were getting altogether too familiar in their relations and Spencer at once set about to investigate the stories. He had lived with his wife for ten years, and while he had been cardioned before that she was rather gay upon certain occasions, he had never found any reasen to believe the reports that had been circulated. In this case he decided to satisfy himself once for all. He laid a deep scheme. He told his wife on Saturday that he was going out of righteous living. The sermon almost shook Spencer's suspicious and came near restoring his faith in his pastor. He did not believe his faith in his pastor. He did not believe that such a good man could go wrong.

At the close of the services at the church Spencer waited at the door just to satisfy himself of the lay of the land. He was rewarded by seeing his wife and the pastor leave the church arm in arm and start for the Spencer home at 1309 Howard street. He followed and had an experience. A young lady who lives at the Spencer home at 1309 Howard street. yeung lady who lives at the Spencer home was entertaining her beau and he proved to be a stayer. Rev. Hampted would not go inside the house while the young man was there and Mrs. Spencer broke into tears and talked about a breaking heart every time the paster hinted about leaving her. She the pastor hinted about leaving her. She wanted him to wait. She told him that Spencer was out of the city and would be absent for several days and that she and the pastor could just have a real love feast while he was away. Rev. Hampted forgot
