From the Woman at Home.

Frank Vanbrugh held a good appointment; their way into the visitor's long lean hand.

taking a short cut to the Strand through some of the narrower and I ss-frequented streets near Drury Lane, when his atten-tion was caught by a figure on the pave-ment which seemed vaguely familiar. Where

But the man was more egile than Vanbrugh thought. He turned a white, terror-stricken glance on his captor, then wrenched himself free and dived down a narrow lane on his right hand. Heedless of consequences.

Vanbrugh plunged in pursuit through the crowd, but the man was evidently well acquainted with the mazes of the streets, and was speedily lost to view. Vanbrugh, per-ceiving his pursuit to be useless, stopped short, and found himself in a narrow alley.

which his instinct teld him was "dangerous." The sinister folk who lounged about it be peered at him from an upper window and retreated-the very face, with its long, fall moustache of the man of whom he was in search. Vanbrugh, as will be evident to every reader of these pages, was not a prudent man. In at the open door of the house, and up the common stair he dashed, quite heedless of the probability that he was rushing headlong into a den of thieves. He had an quick an eye for locality as for likenesses, and know at once the exact position of the room at the window of which he had seen the pseudo Simmonds. He went straight to the door, threw it open, and walked in.

He looked round and stood aghast. No man was in the room at all. It was tenanted only by a tall girl in black, who sat at a table on which stood a sewing machine. As soon as Vanbrugh looked at her and met her eyes he felt vaguely startled and taken aback. Why, this girl—in spite of her shabby clothes, her sewing machine, her poor surroundings—this girl was a lady. Her pale face was exquisitely refined. Her hair shone like spun gold above her common gown. Her eyes were so proud, so sad, so calm, that Vanbrugh's gaze fell beneath them. "Do you want anything?" she said—and her voice was the voice of a lady, too.

on the staff of the Dally Argus, and always had more literary work on hand than he brugh to himself, rather ruefully, when the impecunious literary man had taken his defore, be considered a "rising" man. He had had time to reflect upon his gift and the written a little book of essays, and the critics had told him that he had a style—which is perhaps the highest praise that critics deal in nowadays. On the other hand, his one-volume novel had been pronounced crude, what they know about him." norbid and overambitious, and had gine brough three editions; whence it may easily e seen that he was on the road to popular success. He had begun to know this, chiefly by the kind of circulars that now reached stores, or cutfitters' warehouses; they now brove to contain notices of press-cutting firms, and booksellers' catalogues—a significant change. "Is this farmer" and a significant change. "Is this farmer" and a significant change. cant change. "Is this fame?" he once asked himself, when he was requested to send his photograph and a sketch of his early life to an American newspaper. On second thoughts, he concluded that although it could not be and you've been hit? How much did he got called fame, it might mean success, and he out of you? Motley gave him £5."

went on his way rejoicing.

But even a moderate success like his has its drawbacks, as he discovered, to his cast. Like most journalists, he was not a very early riser, and it was with a feeling of distinct irritation that he heard one morning while he was still in his bath the announcement of a vielter.

"Coming." he roared through the door to the adjacent sitting rosm, and proceeded to dress himself in a leisurely manner, wondering meanwhile whether this early caller were a printer's devil or a dun.

He locked a personable young fellow as he came out of his room, of middle height, muscular, brisk, erect, with a keen, hawk's eye dark hair that curled whenever it was long enough to get a chance, a quick, bright manner and a smile that was very attractive. His air of health, strength and joyousness made him a curious contrast to the strange whom he found in his sitting room, a man who might be any age between 30 and 50 sallow, worn, indescribably fatigued looking with a long, fair mustache, a down trodder look and decidedly shabby clothes of some what foreign cut.

He made a profound bow when Vanbrugh entered, and stood clasping his picturesque that to his side in an attitude of humbiexpectancy, while his host, glancing at him carelessly, asked him to be seated, and him-self took his usual place near his desk. "I am ashamed to intrude upon you," said the man, speaking in a low, fluent voice not unpleasant to hear, "but the fact was that Messrs Malling recommended me to call upon

"Eh?" said Vanbrugh. He suddenly remembered an account that he had lately seen in the papers of a man who visited authors with false testimonials and messages from shoulders and prepared to depart, but at that publishers, and he wondered if this was the moment his eye was caught by a face which with false testimonials and messages from publishers, and he wondered if this was the man. Certainly Messra Malling & Son were his publishers. "Have you a letter from Mr. Malling to me?" he asked rather sharply. The stranger lifted bis hand deprecatingly. "Not from Mr. Malling," he said, in a gentle voice, "but I have a letter to show you. Mr. Malling and the to show you. Mr. Malling and the to show you. Malling said that I sught to show it to you He was very kind, but, of course, he could not find me work to do. It is work that I am in search of, and unless I find it I dare not think of what will happen to my wife and hildren.

He paused and put one long, lean hand over his eyes, as though to keep out the

the door. My poor little girls—sir, on Christmas day I had nothing to give them but bread and cheese—I could not bear to see them crying and I locked myself in my own room away from them. But why should I tell you such pitiful details? Read this letter and you will see that it is no fault of my own—'

His voice choked a little and he held out the letter with a shaking hand. Frank looked at him doubtfully. Either he was splendid actor or his emotion was sincers. looked at him doubtfully. Either he was be splended actor or his emotion was sincere. Vanbrugh had learned by bitter experience to be suspicious of strangers, but he was inclined to believe in this man's veracity.

"I beg your pardon," said Vanbrugh, removing his hat. "I thought I had tracked a man to this room—a swindler, a thief, whom I had long been in search of—but I clined to believe in this man's veracity. clined to believe in this man's veracity.

WHITE CITY BUTTRESSED WITH GREEN

A Mosque for Every Day in the Year and Countless Minarets-Relies of the Crusades and Ancient Moslem Rulers.

Brusa, on the slopes of the Mysian Olympus, was the first, and by all the signs will be the next, and very probably the last, capital of Ottoman rule. When Osman and Orchan led their hordes in from central Asia, says a writer in Harper's Weekly, the latter captured Brusa from the Crusaders, after a ten years' slege, and as sovereign Emir and Padishah, founded the dynasty, whose brilliant court remained there only a century before

Court remained there only a century before Constantinople fell.

This prosperous city of the Asiatic province of Anatolia is reached by small steamers daily traversing the sixty miles between Constantinople and the port of Mudania. A Belgian company built the railway line of twenty-five miles connecting Mudania and Brusa, and an Italian company made a contrast seed which Italian company made a carriage road which is worthy of any English shire, and unique in the sultan's dominions. The hot mineral strings at Brusa were a favorite resort of the Byzantine emperors, and with the added charms of its climate and landscape beauty, this city on the slope of Mount Olympus has always been in great favor with Turkish officials. It has a gay season from May to Octocials. It has a gay season from May to Octo-ber, when the scores of villas on the Mu-dania shores and the Olympic slopes are occupied by Constantinople residents. Ahmed Vefyk Pasha, the last governor of the vilayel, did much in the way of public works and improvements, which are generally admitted to have been undertaken with the view of Brusa becoming a city of refuge for the sultan and his court.

Brusa has a mosque and a walk for every day in the year, and the hundreds of min-arets and low domes give picturesqueness to the white city, which stretches for three or four miles across the greenest buttress of all Olympus, and looks down upon the lovely fertile valley of the Ulfer Chai, fed by the melting snow fields above. There are some 70,000 inhabitants, of whom 12,000 are Armenians, and as many more are Greeks; and thousands of "Cherkesses," or refugees from the Danube provinces, came to the vilayet after the late war, and beame the busiest of its industrial classes Brusa silks and gauzes, Brusa towels, Brusa saddles and shoes, have long enjoyed pref-erence in all the markets of the Levant. A parazite attacked the silk worms some thirty years ago, and silk culture is only now regaining its old footing. The hill slopes about the town and all the valley below are dotted with mulberry plantations, and more cuttings are set out each year, Ahmed Vefyk Pasha established a school of silk culture, where free instruction is fur-nished and pupils are equipped for pursuing this industry, which means so much for the prosperity of Brusa.

The Green mosque is first of all the 365 mosques of Bruss. Its militab, door frames, walls and gallicles are incrusted with old Persian tiles in which the predominating green is but little relieved by the pure turquoise or dull red enamels. On the terrace behind the morque is an octagon tower coated over with soft, faded turquoise tiles, and contalning the tomb of Mohammed I., and a whole little family group of graves. The pall on the sultan's tomb is of heavy red silk woven over with verses from the koran arranged in chevron lines, with the characters raised in gold thread—a fabric of great richness and skilful workmanship. Ahmed Vefyk Pasha had the mosque and the tombs restored by a French artist when earthquake and long neglect had left them almost a

The Great mosque, in the heart of the town, has lost all its illes, but the vast Arab interior has a central dome open to the sky and a plashing fountain beneath. Texts from the koran are written high on the white-washed walls in countless article and in-genious devices, in Cufic, Persian and archaic characters, enclosed in outlines of coffins, swords, circles, stars and blossoms, the most striking decorative effects obtained in any mosque by this Oriental art of ornamental writing. A sheik with his koran class is always sitting near one column, small boys to and fro as they study the good book, soldiers devoutly praying, and even welled women prostrating themselves toward Mecca in this most popular mosque of the Brusa bazars are a labyrinth of great domed halls and chambers, and narrow lanes of booths that are highly attractive. The silks and gauzes, the bath towels, the old embroideries, rugs, metal and leather goods have each a neighborhood of its own, and there is a fruit and sweetmeat bazar in a vine-treilised street that is full of interest. The veiled ladies and their children, the shaggy peasants, and the booted Anatolians in their gay jackets and waistbands, make up street crowds of such color and pic-turesqueness as are never seen in these later days in Constantinople. With all this color and costume now enlivening its street, Brusa is accused of becoming more European and commonplace every year.
