The complaint has developed into a sort of influenza which has become so prevalent as to be al- to prosecute. most universal. The extent to which it is experienced was rather ridiculously in evidence at a performance in a local theater the other night. During a luli in the dialogue, which the heroine improved by wringing her hands and working herself into the frenzy of emotion appropriate to the following lines, a small boy in the upper gallery began to cough. In a second a dozen other small boys in the gal-lery joined the chorus. It spread to the balcony, swooped down into the parquet and richochetted to the stage. In less than ten seconds from the initial demonstration of the small boy the refrain was universal. The heavy soubrette was compelled to participate and even the sorrdwing beroine finally vented her emotion in a scribe of mournful coughs which found echo in every part of the house. It was at least a couple of minutes before the intermedian interruption wholly coared, but the hervine came out a winner, as her fit of coughing had brought the tears that had previously stubbornly refused to flow;
