Dying Men Who Have Left Large Estates to Those Who Had Befriended Them—Phillip's Extraordinary Luck.

There are several instances of men and women in California who have bequeathed to fortunes of upward of a half million dollars by the mere chance, writes a correspondent of the New York Sun.

One or two cases are known in the state where men and women have received bequests of very valuable property by persons whom they barely knew.

There was no reason for the bequest in the case of John B. Brinker, who died in the summer of 1881, leaving an estate of over $250,000 to two persons who happened to be attentive to him in his last and only illness.

Brinkwater came from some little town in Ontario, Canada. He came to California in the 60s, made money in the San Gabriel mines, and went extensively into sheep herding.

Brinkwater was an ignorant man and wonderfully imprudent. He worked day and night with his hand sheeps, saved every cent, and bought more sheep and land. When he was 45 he was worth $100,000, when he was 60 he had 17,000 sheep, real estate in Los Angeles, and a large ranch near the city.

He grew more miserly in his old age, and for weeks at a time he would not let any one near his sheep herds, while his annual income ranged from $15,000 to $17,000.

One day Brinkwater came into Los Angeles to deposit money with the Mexican consul. He was taken ill suddenly. He was so ill that none of the large hotels or boarding houses would receive him.

Several other ex-members spoke of the matter in about the same strain.
