Then came the invocation, in Sanskrit: "Buddha wishes the child health, wealth and presperity, hoping she will have no enomies and plenty of good luck, and be a comfort to her parents to a great age. As pure and as lovely as these flowers are may she be, and I, the headman of the Cingalese here present, according to the custom of our country, name the child, after the town in which she was born, London Hami." Rose leaves were sprinkled over the child; the mother, handing her baby to the sister-inlaw, received from the priest a scroll, bowed thrice, and then resuming her seat, witnessed the performance of the dancers. Carolina Hami, the mother, is a Cingalose lacewoman, aged 25, and her daughter, London Haml, is said to be the first Cingalese baby born in the metropolis.

It is scarcely possible, in a short story like this, to convey any idea of the good results of this work. Thousands of poor, suffering children have been overjoyed at the altogether novel and unexpected visit of the postman to their doors, bringing a paper or a magazine, or a letter, or a parcel, directed in their own names.
