

THE MUTABLE MANY.

BY ROBERT BARR.

The Story of a Labor Union. A Tale of Present Day Problems. With Episodes from Real Life.

Copyright, 1906, by Robert Barr. My position is this, Mr. Sartwell; I don't want to fight for the sake of it, and I have no revengeful desire to humiliate you or to defeat the firm for the mere glory of victory; but I am convinced the men will not get the fair share of what they make until there is a fight and a decisive victory.

Exactly. That is what I want to know. As to winning, we shall see. I quite agree with you that there is nothing so satisfactory as to win in the long run as to lose in the short. Let the best man win. The combatants have a mutual respect for each other.

Do you doubt that I have the interests of the men at heart? No, I don't. I believe you are thoroughly unselfish, but I also believe you are needlessly sacrificing yourself. You see it is difficult for you to come to an agreement, for you look out on the world from entirely different standpoints.

What's that to you, I'd like to know? It's a good deal to me, because it shows that you are not sure of your situation. It shows nothing of the kind. I am a guarantee. Guaranteed! What does a master's guarantee amount to? We're going to win this strike, and then we'll get the wages we want.

Who says it wouldn't? But I haven't the permanent situation you see. Now you are talking sense. Are you a member of the union? Yes, I had a row with the foreman, and he gave me the sack.

in a body, and had made no real attempt to fill their places. He knew in the beginning of the second struggle that he was fighting for his life, and that if he suffered from a lack of success, and the men who had known him for years would know him no more.

It was here that Sartwell had the first touch of his opponent's quality, and his admiration for the young man's shrewdness and knowledge of the business. The fight had been conducted so skilfully that no one could have foreseen what would have happened.

"You're a new comer," he said, accosting him. "Yes," answered the man; "I came this morning." "I'd like to have a word with you," said Marsten, keeping his eyes on the man.

"I'll do no good. I didn't come out to talk; I came out for my dinner." "Of course," returned the man, "I'll be myself; you can talk and eat." "I can pay you for my own dinner."

Who says it wouldn't? But I haven't the permanent situation you see. Now you are talking sense. Are you a member of the union? Yes, I had a row with the foreman, and he gave me the sack.

show his hand with an outburst of eloquence, as had been the habit with Gibbons. The men thought he was saying nothing, and even Marsten's own friends began to feel dubious about the result of the strike.

Once more he paced the room up and down, his frame quivering with the delight of battle and the foreknowledge of victory. The motto, "Love one another," shone prominently, but unnoticed, on the wall.

CHAPTER XXXVI. When the two years' educational course at Eastbourne was finished Edna Sartwell returned to her home in Omaha, Nebraska, to her position in her father's house.

"I'm here to work," said Edna Sartwell, as she entered the room. "What are you doing here?" asked Marsten. "I'm here to work, and I don't give a hang for the union."

"Oh, that kind of high-handed business does not do in this age. You are not an employer, and you are not a worker. You are a man, and you are a woman."

"I shall not call a meeting. If you call one, then you take the responsibility of it. I am a man, and I am a woman. I am not a man, and I am not a woman."

"Love one another" was the sentence that met Marsten's eye whenever he looked up from his seat at the table. He sometimes smiled sadly as he gazed at it.

with it. Edna was the daughter of a man who had been a workman; yet, when she thought over the proposal she had received in the school garden, she was slightly shocked that a workman should aspire to the hand of his master's daughter.

When the strike came on and she knew her father and her own opponents, her state of mind was one of great perplexity. It was hard that one of the other must be defeated, and she sighed when she thought of the result.

But, as war goes on, the original right or wrong almost invariably sinks into insignificance, and we choose our side from other considerations than those which appeal in times of peace to thinking beings.

In spite of the combat between them, Sartwell and his daughter little about the progress of the strike; and she, seeing him disposed to sleep, forebore to question him.

"I'm right enough. A little tired, that's all. No, not a word about the strike to me. I'm a traveler, and I'll have something to tell you when I get home."

Professor Munyon says: "The idea that one must take 'Spring Medicines' is a great mistake. It is true that at this season of the year many changes take place in the human body that affect the blood, liver, kidneys and nerves, but in healthy conditions these changes occur without the help of any of our medicines."
