Merchants Bitten Again. Three merchants discovered the fact yes terday afternoon that they had been caught upon the venerable bogus check deal, and each was out $12. On Saturday night a roughly dressed young man came into the meeting is Sac City.
Boston store and purchased some goods. In payment he offered a check for $12 and received the amount of change due him. The check was drawn on the Council Bluffs Savings bank in favor of John Conners or bearer and was signed by James G. Mercier. In the lower left hand corner a rubber stamp had been used to stamp in the words: "James G. Mercler Pay Check." The check was numbered 47, and the bearer explained that Mercler was a new employer of labor, who had not been long in the city. At Gold-grabber's dry goods store the man presented another check of the same character in payment for a small purchase and received the remainder in cash. The third check was cassed on the Knowles Shoe company. The checks were not banked until late yesterday afternoon, near the close of business, and their sourious nature was not detected until they were sent to the bank for payment. The police were not notified until after dark. The description of the man given by the merchants differ somewhat, but are all close enough to establish the fact that he is the same fellow who passed a number of similar

The board convened at the usual hour in the morning, but did little business while waiting for the opinion. When it was received Paulson was made a party to the suit by agreement, for the purpose of preventing the necessity of another action in court compelling him to surrender the certificate of election. The decree was not officially served until afternoon and the board went to work to canvass the rejected returns. The work proved to be a little bit more than was anticipated, as it involved the necessity for constructing a new abstract of the entire monthly vote. This was more than Auditor Matthews could accomplish during the afternoon and the board adjourned until this morning, when the process of counting Paulson was more and Sawyer in again will be reterminated in the Black Hawk war, reason of this confederacy it became began his argument to the Jury shorty art.

10 o'clock and did not finish speaking until still remains customary to speak of the after 4 o'clock. He referred to the fact that Indians of both the Muskwaki and Sac tribes after 4 o'clock. as the Sac and Fox Indians; yet, so far as I can learn, the two tribes were not closely affiliated in language, and were so far dissimilar in social organization and beliefe that the alliance was never harmonious save under stress of war; and disruption began immediately after the Black Hawk war and continued until the tribes again became distinct, and this despite the mistaken effor of Indian agents and other representatives of the government to perpetuate the confederacy. During and for some time previous to the war against the whites which bears his name, Black Hawk was the wa chief. Black Hawk was a Sac; but, so far as I can gather, Poweshiek, the head of the Muskweki tribe, was the real power behind the throne and Black Hawk's chief adviser.

After the Black Hawk war the Indians withdrew into the unsettled country and about 1853 the two tribes were located together on a reservation in Indian territory; there the antipathy between them soon resulted in dissension, and the Muskwaki Indians gradually land in exchange for popies, furs, etc., and there the greater part of the tribe remains. There are some 400 men, women and children in this main part of the tribe, and they own some 3,000 acres of land, located on both sides of the Iowa river, a few miles west of Tama.

The name of Muskwaki means "red fox,"

Through a combination of accidents—the desire for peace when the Sac Indians. under Black Hawk, stood out for war, the fact that their name was commonly trans-lated into English—the Muskwaki tribe had not received due prominence in the minds of historians and the public. It follows, of course, that the name is a pre-emidently fitting one for preservation in geographic and ther nomenclature. The ordinary spelling of the name is Musquakie, but the orthography adopted in the bureau is as above.

The Cedar Raphis Gazette adds the follow-ing regarding the Muskwakis as known in central Iowa: "Like the Indians of other climes and of other days, the Musquaki had their legends, and the impressions of them are still left in the soil of Linn county, pro-vided they are true. Up the river from Linn Junction about a quarter of a mile has since passed into mist, there is an old Indian burying ground. Many a savage whose wrong-doing toward the palefaces was whose wrong-doing toward the paletaces was very slight lies here in peaceful sleep, and the roor of railroad trains and the rush of travel disturbs him not. He is shooting choicest steaks in the happy hunting ground and his little handful of great grandchildren know of him only in Indian song and story The Musquaki had a civilized idea of the burial of their dead, and when some great sachem passed away they made a panel of wood with a lid to it, placed him inside and dropped the lid and covered it over with dirt. It is said that even in this day the graves can easily be found after an in vestigation below the surface of the ground, but nothing will be found except some mouldy bones and decayed wood which once formed the sarcophagus of the mighty brave. who was once endowed with all the instinct of his savage brethren. And the story run that every twenty years, when the moo cast its wierd rays across the shadowy wood land, the braves rise from their charnel houses and dance the war dance as in days of old, when the tramp of the white man was yet an unfamiliar sound. The story goes that the last epoch was in 1885, when mony. According to these figures the next dance will not occur until 1905. So if you wish to see how the Musquaki did their iest tragedies.

What is known to the old residents as "Usher's Bottoms," in the heavy woodland just back of Linn Junction and in the immediate vicinity of the burying ground, was the home of the tribe from '54 to '57. They made their wigwams of bark and many a feast of corn and dog was held beneath the grateful shade of the woodland. Indian funerals were an uncommon sight, for the Muskwaki was a hardy redskin and he lived long. So far as known but one white man ever beheld the ceremony over the death of a red Muskwaki. He had been hunting and stumbled upon the camp unobserved. It was the custom to kill the favorite dog on the death of a chief and this particular canine was tied to a tree with a red string about its neck, dead as a smelt. The tree for some distance about the camp were dec orated with red cloth or cord and the imme diate relatives, as they were supposed to be, wore red strings about their necks.

The story comes to this generation through elderly citizens who have a distinct recollection of the event, that old Poweshiek, lection of the event, that old Powenhiek, the head and front of the tribe, was on the ground during the inundation of the Cedar in 1821. His story is that the water rose until it was as high as the top of the first story of any of the buildings on Second street, in the vicinity of Second avenue. According to this Cedar Rapids of today would have been a wet town and the largest river steamboats could ply with ease up and down the payed avenues of busy traffic. down the paved avenues of busy traffic. There was a high embankment in the block where now rests the Merchants' National bank. Poweshiek says that the water was so high at that point that four Indians standing erect would fill the little knoll left high and dry above the rushing river. It is generally conceded that the Muskwakis were always peaceful toward the whites and never, so far as can be learned, was the hair of a paleface raised by knife of these friendly redmen, but they often assisted them in protecting their homes and their loved ones against the cruelties of other redskins who were not so
