Auditor of State Feels the Blast from the Suprema Court.

HIS RECORD IN HANDLING PUBLIC FUNDS

Used the Fees Collected as His Own Money and Finally Returned the Cash in Installments to the Trensurer.

LINCOLN, Sept. 25 .- (Special.) -- When the decision in the Broatch-Moores case was given out by the supreme court there was much jubilation among the state officials, but a close reading of the decision has caused them to change their tune and sing very low. It has been discovered that a strict interpretation of the rule faid down by the supreme court would declare at least one of the state officials to be a defaulter and ineligible to hold the office. While there is as yet no move made to take the officials into court and inquire into their methods of handling the public funds, the recent decision is sufficiently strong to keep the reformers on the anxious seat from now until election day.

The state officer most directly affected by the decision is Auditor Cornell, who, by his own statements, is shown to have illegally carried public funds about with him and manipulated them the same as if they were his own private funds. This practice, which was carried on quite extensively last year, was only stopped after a public exposure had been made by The Bee, and the auditor was compelled to disgorge the money and pay it to the treasurer. That some of this money was tied up in private bank accounts or in private enterprises so that it could not readily be produced is best proven by the auditor's official statements.

Was Holding State Money. On the first of June, 1897, the auditor made a statement of the affairs of his office, but this document was carefully kept from the public for the good and sufficient reason that it showed that the auditor had in his possession $7,938 that belonged in the state treasury and which the constitution directed "should be paid into the state treasury in advance." Some of the money auditor had retained in his possession for four or five months, although the state treasury door was less than twenty feet from his own office. The shortage of the auditor was discovered on an enspection of the records in the treasurer's office, and the exposure that followed induced him to pay in part of the money during the following month.

The official statement issued by the auditor in the first days of December shows

It is only since the decision of the supreme court in the Eugene Moore case, holding that the auditor has no right to collect fees, that this manip ulation of the fee money has ceased.

Attitude of the Court. The recent decision of the court in the Broatch-Moores case holds that the public officer who deposits public funds in a bank as his own money or uses it for private purposes is a defaulter, even though his intention is to ultimately turn the money into the public treasury. This intention, according to the court's decision, could not operate to his advantage if he had been "a man of large means and credit," the only logical meaning of this being that he could have made good his default, "and this consideration has doubtless moved many, if not most, defaulting officers to take risks which have proven their destruction. In a majority of cases of defalcation it is quite likely that the first misappropriation was made in the full confidence that it would be made good and no one would be harmed. There is no middle ground either of safety or honesty. Trust funds must be held sacred, and the officer who appropriates them to his of Nebraska, addressed a populist meeting $5,000; president, W.
