The deceased brave's headquarters and an officer detailed to look name was Nah-tow-waw-pe-moh. He was stricken with malarial fever Friday, and preferring to rely on the cures of the Indian medicine man, rather than take the pre scriptions of physicians, he was not moved to the hospital until Saturday when it was too late to save his life.

At the morgue a group of copperskins worked for hours preparing their dead for burial. They carefully braided the long black hair, weaving in bits of bright colored ribbons and tying the ends with beaver talls. They ornamented the ears with earrings in the form of tiny tomahawks. They they applied the war-paint, and when their task was finished left the lifeless countenance of the brave bearing the marks and coloring with which he was accustomed to appear in battle. They wrapped him in a long winding sheet or shroud made of soft blue material worked with multicolored beads in countiers designs. Then there was buckskin breeches with blue silk trimmings, and moccasincovered with tiny shells, and when the deceased brave was suitably attired to ensure a propitious entrance into the happy hunting grounds he was a curious representation of all in life that Indians find beautiful.

When the body was placed in its sombre casket, room was found for a lunch pail containing edibles, and a leather sack which held the articles that are indispensable to an Indian's everyday life. They were the orthodox long-stemmed pipe, a package of smoking tobacco and a plug of the same plant. In addition to these there were a soup bowl and spoon, this being done in accordance with the religious belief that dead men must have sufficient food when they arrive in the hunting ground to last until They can kill some game. The funeral cortege consisted of an express wagon in which the squaws rode, a wagen to carry the casket, while the men followed on ponies. At the graveside the brave's arms were freed from the shroud and all of his former friends and relatives indulged in a farewell handshake, the final details of the ceremony.
