LIKE THE DOGE'S PALACE. Stuyvesant Fish's New Home Will Be a Reproduction of It. Stuyvesant Fish, president of the Illinots Central railroad, is building a palace in New York City. Its interior is to be, so far as possible, a reproduction of one of the most famous palaces in the world, that of the Doge of Venice. This fancy will cost a great deal of money. It will pay a handsome tribute to the custom house, involving. as it does, the importation of large quantities of art treasures and antique furniture.

The house is nearly finished. Its exterior is imposing, but not ornate. The style, a mixture of renaissance and colonial, is rather severe than otherwise. From the dining and reception rooms of the first floor one will ascend by a marvelous staircase to what will probably be the largest and most beautiful private ball room in New York. This staircase will be carefully modeled by Italian craftsmen, after the staircase leading from the interior court of the Doge's palace to the upper loggia. In the early renaissance style the original was built in the middle of the fifteenth century by the Venetian architect, Antonio Ticci. It is known as the "Giant's staircase," because at the top stand two colossal statues of Neptune and Mars. These statues, dating from 1554, have never been admired by artists, and Mr. Fish will substitue for them more worthy figures. The richly decorated gilt carving and paneling which give character to the Venetian palace will be reproduced in the Fish most part, of the treasures of Venice-will help to impart to Mr. Fish's new home an atmosphere of the middle ages, which will distinguish it sharely from every other residence in New York City. Pictures worthy et such an environment and plentiful enough to carry out the manner of the Venetian original will adorn the walls. Beneath the feet of the visitor will be costly and intricate mosaics. Hangings of the richest fabrics, suggesting the most prodigal period of interior decoration, will relieve, or help the prevailing color, which will be yellow Mirrors, in frames of gold, will reflect the ments in New York.
