in the big pavilion throughout Saturday night and Sunday. It was a noisy but sympathetic and impartial crowd, urging and encouraging each rider in turn. There was plenty of enthusiasm, too, when Miller, at the end of the one hundred and twenty-seventh hour, rode his two thousandth mile in 2:25 3-5, unpaced. Rocky Hill, being a short walk from Washington's quarters, was frequently visited by the general. Young Dunlap was introduced to the commander-in-chief, who praised the boy's crayon portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Van Horne and consented to sit to him. A triumphan moment for a boy of 17, but also one of anxiety, fear and trembling. Washington was so much pleased with the youthful artist that he often invited him to breakfast and to ditte at headquarters, where Haggard Pedal-Pushers Spurred to he met members of congress and other distinguished men. The assertion that he never laughed arose from his habitual reserve—a habit formed by the fact that from youth he had beet employed in public affairs and conversant with public men, and thus had been taught the necessity of taking heed to his words. 'There," said John Adams, as he gazed the first time on Stuari's portrait of Washington, "is a man who kept his lips shut-which this old fool never could!" "I remember," writes Dunlap, "during my pportunity of observing his deportment two instances of unrestrained laughter. The first and most moderate was at a bon mot, or anecdote, from Judge Peters, then a member of congress and dining with the general."

It is not strange that Washington laughed at Judge Peters' humorous stories. Even dignified, reserved Indians could not withstand his humor.
