Zero Weather Episode. Pedestrians on Fifth avenue last Friday. relates the Chicago News, were treated to the unique spectacle of a huge policeman carefully ladling spoonfuls of hot coffee onto the outstretched tongue of a very small newsboy who stood with his face pressed close to an iron handrall and woke the echoes with his screams. It was all the result of a "joke" on the part of two small companions of the boy, they having told him to lick the iron "to see how funny it feels." It being below zero weather, of course the tongue stuck fast and the boy, by igorous use of his lungs, became the center of a crowd in less than no time All sorts of suggestions for relief were offered and rejected, till the big policeman brought a cup of hot coffee from a neighboring restaurant and "melted him loose," as he explained it. A contribution for the sufferer was in progress of collection when the disunion was effected, but before it could be presented the boy had broken through the crowd and was botly pursuing periment with the expressed intention of

'mauling the life out of him."

He adds that he has no doubt that such a man might be had for very high wages, "as money we know will fetch anything and command the service of any man," and he is very careful to say "but with the former I do not abound." was a time when he was feeling land poor, as he did not infrequently, being sometimes compelled to borrow and at others to sell some of his land holdings. He also appears to have experienced difficulty at times in getting proper returns and many a farmer today will sympathize with Washington when he wrote to one of his farm managers, in 1799, as follows: "It is hoped and will e expected that more effectual measures will be pursued to make butter another year; for it is almost beyond bellef that, from 101 cows actually reported on a late enumeration of the cattle, I am obliged to buy butter for the use of my family." This reads very much like some of the results achieved by Henry Ward Beecher and Horace Greeley in their attempts at farming. Washington cultivated his farms, however, with much foresight and the instructions which he issued to his managers would constitute even now a valuable farm mannal. These instructions show his great familiarity with all the processes of farming

'sufferings in service" of the respective candidates. Third-A regard for the geographical distribution of the offices, to the end that there might be a distribution of appointments in as equal a proportion as might be to persons belonging in the different states. In 1795, he stated in a letter to Timothy Pickering: "I shall not, whilst I have the honor to administer the government, bring a man into any office of consequence knowingly, whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the general government is pursuing, for this, in my opinion, would be sort of political sul-cide." At the same time no man has ever regarded political parties as more perilous to the country and his warning in the farewell address against the spirit of party would do credit to the most prono mugwump of modern times. In 1796 he writes: "I have never made an appointment from a desire to serve a friend or re-lation." Again, in the same year, he dethe one who had been his adviser in the ex- clares: "I can defy malignancy itself to ascribe partiality or interested motives to any of my nominations." So determined was he that no act of his should give occaion for calling in question the disinterestedness of his motives that he laid it down as a rule of conduct never to give an appointment to a relative. His successor, John Adams, protested against what he styled Washington's "hyper-superlative public virtue" in this matter. In the "Eight dollars for that bird, no bigger opinion of Mr. Adams a president should not be influenced for or against a candidate by any consideration of his relationship Jefferson adopted the principle latil down by Washington and wrote: "Mr. Adams degraded himself infinitely by his conduct on this subject, as General Washing the had done himself the greatest honor." Most of our presidents, it can be said to their redit, have followed the illustrious examde set by Washington. The conduct of General Grant in this particular occasioned a vast amount of criticism, which was by no neans confined to the party of the opposi-
