Beef Like Wet Seaweed (Continued from First Page.) all was putrid when delivered late in the afternoon. In reply to a direct question of Colonel Davis, the witness said he had never entertained an idea at Santiago or Mantua that the beef had been treated chemically to preserve it. Replied further, he expressed the belief that had a herd of cattle been about the camp in Cuba all killing would have had to be done after sunset and all tasted before 8 o'clock in the morning. Reasoning from his experience in the civil war, when cattle on the hoof were slaughtered and issued at night and satisfaction resulted, he thought cattle on the hoof in Cuba would have been preferable to the refrigerated beef supply.

Witness explained that the beef had been "killed" mostly small, as though it had been shot up in a slow range. It turned him against the meat, so he took down in preference. When he reached the ship the time, but many of his men were sick. Replied to Colonel Gillespie, he said he had no reason to believe the other officers in his mess did not use the meat. He said the refrigerated beef at Santiago had a yellow appearance on the outside that he had never noticed upon the refrigerated beef formerly furnished at Fort Riley, Kan., where he was stationed. When he ate it at Santiago he was inclined to suspect the refrigerated beef at Santiago had been treated chemically to preserve it, because the cattle could have been driven to the camp, slaughtered, issued and cooked. He said he had not suggested this because no cattle were near and the camp was a long way from the place where cattle could be secured.

Men Couldn't Eat It. "A great many of the men would eat the canned roast beef and turn about quickly and vomit," Captain Davis said, "and finally they refused to eat it at all." This was in response to a question to the witness as to how many of the men at the camp of illness among his troops. Captain Davis believed much of it was due to this beef. No other food caused vomiting immediately after eating, he said, but the sickness was only transient. Responding to Colonel Gillespie, witness said he thought the inability to eat the roast beef did not cause illness, because there was an abundance of other food. Major Stephen Baker, retired, attached to the Fourth Infantry during the Santiago campaign, said canned roast beef was issued after landing and until after the surrender and complaints of a special character were made generally by the men and captains. No definite attempt to remedy the illness as the ration was made, he said, because all realized that the best possible was being done under the circumstances and they were glad to get anything.

Spotted on the Way to Camp. Major Jesse M. Lee, Ninth infantry, who joined his regiment at Santiago July 20, said refrigerated beef was furnished, seemingly daily, and frequently spotted before it could be gotten to camp two miles from the city. In an experience of thirty-six years Major Lee said he had never known of a can of roast beef ever being issued and he had no experience with it in the war. Captain James P. Jackson, Seventh infantry, who was in the battle and siege of Santiago, said canned roast beef was issued off and on while they remained in Cuba. A few complaints were made, but he investigated and found it was generally eatable. He ate it, he said, and found it rather tasteless, but nourishing. Refrigerated beef was issued after the surrender, but about one-half was spotted when delivered, the camp being about four miles from the depot. Witnesses never had an idea of any chemical treatment of the beef. An open wagon, he said, was used in transporting the beef and it was delivered in the open. He made a report recently upon the beef under orders from his colonel, but otherwise his sense of duty to his men and command would not have prompted him to have made a report.
