HOGS—The market on hogs today was 2½

55 lower, nearer 5c than 2½c. At first sellers were slow to make the concession and the early market was very much inclined to drag, for the reason that holders would not let go. A little later, when it became evident that there was a general decline at all the leading selling points, sellers gave in and let their hogs go. Therefore, in spite of the slow opening the pens were cleared early in the forenoon and the trade as a whole was fairly active at the iceline noted. at the fecline noted. Keepsakes? Certainly not now. Suddenly she sighted a familiar ragged jacket and a familiar, dreadfully dirty looking cap. It was the boy. It was nearly dusk, but she still could notice he looked feeble and somehow smaller than before. He was shrinking in a corner and holding out papers with remarkable timidity for a street arab. In fact, he held himself so out of the crowd that Miss Jennie had courage to go up and speak to him alone.

"Please, boy," said she, blushing very much, "I want to thank you for something you did for me." The boy squirmed and shrivelled in the corner. Jennie felt relieved. She was half afraid he would be a very vulgar boy and greet her with a too cordial familiarity. "Yes, m'm, least no, m'm; twasn't me

The boy-the boy wore certainly the nether garments of a boy, but he broke into a torrent of tears, huddling down in his corper, which assured the amazed Miss Jennie that he wasn't a boy at all, but a girl. Only a girl could weep in that way. Down went Jennie's magazine, poem forgotten; down went Jennie's pocketbook, the check forgotten; down went good little Jennie herself in the corner, her tears at once flowing in sympathy.

"You poor little thing," cried Jennie, what are you doing here, dressed like "Di-Di-Dick's ill, and can't walk, an'-an'dad made me come!'

"But your dress!" "Girls ain't 'lowed to sell papers, so dad old me to wear Di-Di-Dick's clo's." "Is Dick very ill?"

"He's dying!" came out with a wail.

Jennie trembled, gathering her purse and magazine together. She had made money by selling the misery of a dying child-a child who had no money. Jennie trembled and then she picked up the little girl, and took her hand and said: "Let us go and see and comfort Dick."

> PRESERVE THE CLIFF DWELLINGS. Historic Stone Homes Ravaged Relie Hunters.

Centuries ago, says the Denver Repub lican, a strange race inhabited the great canyons of the southwestern corner of this state and the adjacent corners of New Mexto and Arizona. A stronger race lived some where in the more level lands to the north and west. The people of the canyons, in fear of invasion, built their houses high on the rocky walls, in places where strangers would not think of looking for them, and in side canyons where penetration was impossible except to those who knew the trails, The stronger race of the outland has disappeared and left no trace. The Indian ribes which now inhabit the region have no legends of their predecessors, and there are no ruins. The Cliff Dwellers have also gone beyond kuman ken, but the precautions they took to save their lives and property have preserved their memory among men. Their stone dwellings continue almost as they left them, except where the vandals of the present decade have been at work.

Whether a change of natural conditions turned their tilled fields into the barren wastes which they now are, so that they must travel to other parts of the continent or whether war or pestilence exterminated the race, no one knows. The tale may be written in the surroundings of some of the deserted dwellings if men with trained eyes reach them before the relic hunters.

A few of the dwellings have been located nd made accessible. The result of this pening to civilization has been so disastrous that it is absolutely necessary that protection be thrown around the region before there is further exploration. The stone walls while they have stood intact for perhaps ages, are easily tumbled over. Behind them are many rocky recesses where pottery, stores of corn, clothing and the bones and mummies of people are to be found. Relic hunters, poking about for something to carry home and put on their mantels, have piled great buildings in ruins. The evidences by which ethnologists might trace the genesis and relationship of the race have been scattered and destroyed. Even rock carvings and paintings have been obliterated by van dals

There is little doubt that only a begining has been made in tracing out these old hidden homes. The purpose of the builders was to make them hard to find. There are undoubtedly other buildings in the region larger and more perfectly preserved than those that have been discovered and practically destroyed. Unless measures are taken to protect them they will be found only to meet with the old fate. A movement has been started in this city to secure adequate protection for the buildings which are known now or which may be found in this remarkable region. It been proposed that congress be asked to make a national park of all the lands which are not available for modern settlers, on which there are ruins, and to ask the Smithsonian institute to take charge of the and sickness gave the little poem birth. work of exploring the canyons for more she walked on with her head in the air, and an athletic, touch-me-not grace which, national park idea, though we cannot see ing up a dyke to prevent the river from perhaps, basket ball had assisted nature to any logical ground for it. Protests filed at land offices against attempts to pervert the land laws to secure ownership of any ruins would be effective. The necessary thing is vigilance. We hope that those who have taken up the work will persevere and that their ranks will be swelled by earnest recruits until awakened public interest assures that this region will not through foolish neglect lose such valuable attractions as the cliff dwellings.

Which will begin publication

Omaha Sunday Bee, June 18th

A STORY that gallops from the first line to the last, that tells a chivalric and intensely dramatic love story, that follows the intricate plottings of master diplomats.

"The plot is fresh, the intrigue ingenious, the portraiture vivid and the treatment unhackneyed. . . Altogether this is a fierce and vivid ro-> Curiously enough the collaborators bear the unusual relation of mother and son. E. & H. Heron is the nom de plume for K. & Hesketh Prichard. mance." - London Spec-

The players of this Game with a King, the prize of which is the winning of a kingdom, are Count Sagan, agruff, unscrupulous, reckless giant, the commander of the guards of Maasau. He plays as a tool in the hands of Selpdorf, Chancellor to the King, the 'man of the hour." And behind these two, old Major Counsellor, representing England, the shrewdest diplomat of Europe, and Baron von Elmer of Germany, play the intricate keys of diplomacy. The King of Maasau, who is weak, worn out and suspicious, is a mere puppet in the hands of these master players. The pawns of the game are John Rallywood, the Modern Mercenary, a straight back, fearless young Englishman who fights a duel as cheerfully as he makes love to a nobleman's daughter; Valeria, the heroine, and the Countess Sagan, who loves the hero and appears as Valeria's bitter rival. All this takes place in the independent state of Maasau, which is so small that it is hardly noticeable even on the largest sized map of Europe.
