ACETYLENE GAS.

Some of the Drawbacks to Its Continued Use.

plies with special fitness to the attractive gas acetylene. The comments of Prof. Vertess were elicited by an official examination which he made of the acetylene plant which supplies the town of Veszprim, in Hungary. He says the carbide from which the gas is made is never pure, but always contains at least twenty per cent of impurities. The effect of this is to make it most difficult to ascertain with any approach to accuracy what return of gas can be secured from a given quantity of carbide. Furthermore, the carbide is so little homogeneous that several samples must be tested in order to obtain a mean value. Prof. Vertess calls particular attention to a fact which seems little known to many who advocate the use of acetylene for domestic lighting. Carbide contains sulphur, phosacetylene will be contaminated with sulphurated hydrogen, phosphureted hydrogen and ammonia. The acetylene must, there-fore, be purified to the same extent as is coal gas, for fear that its use in closed places might cause serious accidents. But the greater drawback of all is that acetylene burns with a smoky flame. At first, . a 4:50 pm a 8:35 am the flame is beautifully bright and clean, This comes from the burners attaining a CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & temperature higher than that of the decom-CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & St. Paul Railway—City Ticket Office, 1504 Farnam Street. Telephone, 284. Depois of the acetylene, and thus the gas is decomposed into carbon and hydrogen. A curious phenomenon is noticeable in the gas pipes. Not only do they deposit a finely divided carbon, like soot, but they conclude a very remarkable liquid, consisting slour City & Des Moines of carbides of hydrogen. These bodies are also formed in the generators, whence the necessity of using siphons. It is thus seen that the claim that acetylene does not require purifying is a fallacy. Prof. Vertess points out another inconvenient result of the impurities contained in acetylene. When acetylene is burning in a closed place a sort of fog will often fill the room after a longer or shorter interval. The cause of this is that from the decomposition of the acetylene in the burner the carbon is deposited while the hydrogen burns, inducing the formation of watery vapor, and it is this, in conjunction with the ammonia, the suiphureted hydrogen and the phosphureted hydrogen, which produces the fog and induces the distressing headache and nausea; so well known to those who have tried, burning acetylene in their own houses.
