IS THE TEAR HABIT PASSING?

Some Observations by a Cynical Old A cynical old bachelor lately remarked, in he hearing of a woman reporter of the Washington Times, that he wondered what had become of all the crying women. He said that he had not seen a woman ery in some years and that so far as he could see there are just as many things to cry over as there ever were and just as many women He did not object to the absence of tears; he only wondered about it.

This thing has received attention of valous kinds before now. It was first noticed in the novels. The young woman in modern fiction does not do nearly so much weeping as she used to do. To be sure, she has not always so much excuse for it When a young woman was carried away by a flerce and determined lover whom she did not want, and told that unless she marimmediate friends would be killed, there present century. They say that Sometimes she was a young lady of reliwhen range cattle have a light growth of glous predilections and shed tears over the sorrows of others, or over her own rewill be mild and feel safe in arranging ac- ligious sentiments. It has been estimated cordingly. Last winter, for instance, they by careful statisticians that Miss Ellen Montgomery, heroine of "The Wide, Wide World," must have shed at least five gallons two quarts and one pint of tears in the course of her adventures in two volumes. But the young lady in the modern work of fiction does not cry. If she is of a passionate nature she now and then 'bursts into a storm of sobs," but she does not often do it, as old-fashioned people would say, "before folks." She is more likely to preserve a calm and more or less uncomprehended silence. Another type of dures all her tribulations in silence, or the officers of the railway company went laughs about them, and is the sunshine of the family circle while her heart is se cretly breaking. It must be confessed that erably more to the taste of the ordinary man than the old-fashioned type of tearful fiction, and this ideal is decidedly worth studying by the novel-reading girls of today.

A KLONDIKE OF ANTIQUES.

A New York Artist Discovered it #2d Gave the Snap Away. There is a little story far on the east side of New York City, in the Jewish quarter, which is known to only a few artists and art collectors, and the address of which they would not give to "brother collectors" under any circumstances. A few years ago, relates the New York Pimes, a Russian Jew came to this country and, as he had dealt in metal goods in the land of the czar, continued in the same business here. He opened a tiny basement shop and began with a stock of samovars and other articles imported from Russia. Most of them were second-hand and the larger part of the business consisted in repairing vessels that

One day a New York artist was "slum ming," if that term can be applied to search ng the East Side for antiques. The gleam of a copper plaque behind a very dirty window caught his eye and he made his way down the steps, through a dark passage and into the basement. When he turned round after finding his way into the store he was equally astonished and delighted. For on the floor, on the walls and in a living and sleeping room at the rear, were glorious objects in brass and copper-200-year-old candlesticks from synagogues, samovars richly chased in quaint designs, great plates with beaten coats of arms and dragons. He secured almost enough of these objects from the unsophisticated dealer to stock a whole studio, and returned in a week's time to get more. Then he, to his intense regret after-Chase. Mr. Chase knows a good thing in the antiquity line when he sees it and every one who was privileged to visit his studio on Tenth street before it was dismantled will remember the splendid collection of copper vessels which filled one end of it. The next collector who was let into the secret was Mr. Drake of the Century Magazine. He also became a regular cusomer of the little Russian Jew. The latter now knows that old things ire sometimes worth a good deal more than new ones and no longer lets a samovar worth $50 go for $1.50. But even now his prices, as compared with those charged by Fifth avenue dealers, are as the cost with business men and miners from all sec- of a calico gown to a silk dress.
