The Ceres put on full steam and made for the burning vessel. On reaching it a boat was lowered and sent to the Patria, the captain of which stated he was in urgent need of assistance. He requested that the passengers should be saved. The boats were got out and with a great deal of difficulty all the passengers, numbering about 150, were transferred to the Ceres. The Ceres, which was proceeding down the channel, made for Dover, which was reached shortly before midnight. Information of the disaster was sent ashore to American Consul Prescott, who made arrangements at the Dover Sailors' Home and local hotels in the neighborhood of the pier. Prescott immediately consulted the Dover harbormaster, Captain Iron, who at once sent the harbor tug Lady Vita to land the passengers from the Ceres. Most of the hotels were full, but in every case arrangements were improvised for the reception of the shipwrecked.

It was midnight when the tug returned to the admiralty pier with the rescued on board. They literally swarmed over the tug and looked a motley crowd of men, women and children crowded together, both on the Ceres her head rested on the edge of the bed and and the tug. There were twenty-four women in the party and twenty children, six being bables in arms.

The tragedy occurred at the Mitchell woman's house, in West Sixth street. Mrs. Hayslip had deserted her husband for Berry and Maud Mitchell had influenced her to make the decision. Arrested soon after the commission of the crime, Hayslip admitted he had deliberately planned the murder for revenge When told that his wife was dead he said: "I am sorry for it now."

At 12:30 this afternoon Hayslip, revolver in hand, burst into a room where the trio were and immediately began shooting. The first shot struck Mrs. Hayslip in the head, the second pierced her heart. The revolver was a 45-caliber and each bullet made an ugly hole. She begged for mercy, but Hayslip was ruthless. When found by the police she was in the attitude of prayer.

The next two shots struck Berry in different parts of the body and he ran from the room and into the street, mortally wounded, the blood streaming from his wounds. The fifth bullet struck the Mitchell woman in the side and when the police arrived she
