Life insurance is defined to mean a company that issues policies on the lives of individuals, payable after, at, or before the death of the individual,' but does not pay accident insurance for the benefit of living persons injured by accident. Accident companies are 'those companies that issue policies payable at the accidental death of the insured, or agree to pay accident benefits to living persons injured by accident, or one that issues both such forms of policies, and a life and accident company one that insures both life and accident policies.

Accident Policies.

"You will notice that the idea of an accident policy as defined by this section of the statute applies strictly to accidents to individuals, this is, to persons and not t things. Then miscellaneous companies are defined to mean 'all other companies are and every character which can be incorporated under this act or which may be admitted from other states and countries in compliance with this act."

"A fair interpretation of this act and its attempts to define different classes of insurance would be that the primary definition of fire insurance companies are those that insure property against fire and lightning; of life companies, those that insure against death to individuals; and of accident companies, those that insure against accidents or casualties to human beings; and miscellaneous companies would include all other kinds of insurance against loss to
