RACE HORSE SAVES A LIFE

Story of Another Survivor of the Plam Creek Massacre.

BEE GIVES HIM FIRST NEWS OF OTHERS

Picked Up by Montana Party and Drifts to Other Side of the World—Leg Broken When Found by Rescuers.

PLATTSMOUTH, Neb., March 8.—To the Editor of The Bee: In several issues of your paper, including the 8th inst., I have read accounts of the Plam Creek massacre. All were substantially correct with the exception of some additional facts known to myself. I was a member of that party, joining it at Plattsmouth. I was hired by T. H. Bradley of Sacramento, Cal., to take through two thoroughbred race horses—a stallion and a mare. I was lying at this point, having come up the river from St. Louis, waiting for some train to pull out for California. Although the Morton party was going to Colorado I joined it because it was a small party, thinking it would travel faster than a large train, and hoping later to join another train going through to my destination. On the morning of the attack all took place substantially as detailed by Mrs. Stevens. I was mounted on the mare, the faster of the two animals in my charge. Just as we pulled out I stooped down and caught up a little girl about 2 years old. I cannot now remember which one of the party she belonged to, and placed her on the saddle in front of me.

To show how little things will stay with one I remember how she laughed and how her hair blew into my eyes when I kissed her. I was still carrying her when the Indians rushed over the bluff. At the first fire full one-half of the men seemed to fall. An arrow struck my mare in the shoulder and she immediately began to back. But being at the time a professional horse-breaker, I stuck to her and held onto the child. I knew at once that all was up, and saw that my only hope was to get the mare quieted, and if possible run away from the Indians. I gave her a vicious dig with the spurs, and with one last jump, that night unscathed me, she lit into a run—and such running. The pain of the arrow wound, the yelling and shouting of the Indians, seemed to lend her wings.

The bullets whistling by, and the arrows passed with that peculiar zip, zip, that once heard is never forgotten. I bent over the child to protect her. Her fingers were gripped in my whiskers with that strength peculiar to a child's hands when fastened on forbidden articles. We were gaining and I could see that unless a missile stopped us, we stood a fair show of getting away.

The race continued this way for, I should judge, three-fourths of a mile, and I had placed perhaps 250 yards between us. I looked back over my shoulder and saw that the band had come to a stop. One Indian had dismounted, squatted down and was taking a long and careful aim. I in- voluntarily drew my head between my shoulders and bent low. A full second before I heard the crack of the gun I felt the mare gather under me and give vent to a long-drawn groan, human in its intensity. An ounce ball from a heavy buffalo gun had pierced her lengthwise. At the time we were just on the edge of a bench, near twenty feet high, that broke over to the creek. The mare in her last dying spring went clear over, and that was the last I knew until sometime in the night. It was bright moonlight, and every object was as plain as day. To the left lay the mare, just as she had fallen. I was lying on my back looking straight up. On the edge of the bar sat two huge buffalo wolves waiting for their meal of horse flesh. They were held back by the fear that class of animals entertain for man so long as life remains. I lay thinking, thinking. By all my knowledge I ought to be dead.

Accounts for His Escape. With my hands I raised myself to a sitting position and tried to arise. I soon saw that something was wrong and that was a broken leg. I looked around for the little child, she was nowhere to be seen. I gently called, but received no answer. I never heard of her again until I read in The Bee not long ago that a little girl was found after the massacre on the trail. She must have been the same child. The only way I could afterward account for my escape was that the Indians, seeing themselves distanced, tried the effect of a parting shot, and not knowing its effect, as we went out of sight over the bar, thought we had escaped and hurried back to share in the plunder from the wagons.

At the time, to my mind's imagination, it seemed the Indians must still be near. I could hear the rippling of the water in the creek. Its sound aggravated my intolerable thirst. Despite my broken leg I began to draw myself toward the creek. Some I was at its edge and lay and lapped the water like a dog. Then a terrible fear came over me, a fear that the Indians would find me. My strongest desire was to hide myself. I drew myself deep into a clump of willows and laid there several days. I know I have now that my head must have been hurt, for blanks occurred in which I must have been insensible. Once I heard voices. I probably the party from the stockade. To my heated imagination they were Indians. I drew myself deeper into the brush. At night I would crawl to the creek and drink, drink, drink.

Found by a Dog. On what must have been the third day a big black dog came nosing and sniffing into the brush. He started back with a growl when he saw me, his hair bristling with the wrong way. I gave myself up for lost, when I heard a man's voice say: "What's the matter, Jack?" The brush cracked and I knew some one was forcing his way through. The noise stopped and then I heard a voice back of me say: "Jack's found a dead Indian. No, by love; he's a white man, and alive, too!" I could not groan. When I came to a right knowledge of myself I was lying in a spring wagon and on the move. The men who found me were of a party bound to Montana. Some were for taking me back to Plam Creek station. But a young doctor with the outfit insisted if they did I would die without the care of a physician. He carried his point. Nor would he consent for them to leave me this side of Ogden, but attended me faithfully to that place, whence our trails diverged. His name was Mc-Bride, a Scotchman and a skillful surgeon. I never saw him again, but I certainly owe him my life and a leg one inch shorter than its mate. When I had fully recovered I worked my way on
