Character is that which forms the mental and moral structure of the life. It is that which makes up the ideal man or woman, but an ideal always suspectible of tradizi-tion. You will be no more, no less, than what your characters are. It is the character of anything that de-termines its moral force or value. We sometimes spenk of the character of a paper or book, but we do not refor to the form of type or binding, but to the con-tents, to that which invests it with moral qualities and makes it a factor for good or ill. If I were called upon to define char-acter I should say that it is a moral con-dition produced by the agregate of all our acts.
