> While it is true that the invariable play of third best is sometimes of value in enabling your partner to secure an exact count of your hand, we think the holding up of but one card in all cases has more advantages in its favor. It effects the most important result to begin with, that of preventing the third round of the suit from partner. It informs him at once, and this is often of special importance, that if the smallest two cards not held by him are missing some one is calling or false carding. Again, when third best is played, the suit is often trumped on the first round by the adversaries and your top cards are needed for the protection of the suit, but you are compelled to either call for trumps when you do not want them or throw away valuable cards and keep

The various short suit systems, of course do not include number showing in partner's suit and are much weaker on that account The Minneapolis system includes a curious rule of showing number in partner's suit only when helding exactly four-that is, if a player holds ace, king, queen, and another, on his king-queen his partner, holding five would play douce and trey, giving the leader no reason for changing his suit, and the result is that which all good players so greatly dread, allowing one opponent to
