RELIGION HELPS FISH TRADE. "Though most of the sturdy fisherfolk of Newfoundland are Protestants," says a writer in Ainslee's Magazine, "they derive the larger part of their living from the people of Roman Catholic countries. The fact that in the course of the year there are many fast days, when millions of Roman Catholics eat little animal food, except fish, has been a godsend to the greatest fishing countries, which have thus been provided with certain and regular markets for their fish. It is well known that the inhabitants of the temperate zones are eating less and less salt fish. Pickled herring, twenty years ago, was landed to the amount of scores of thousands of barrels a year at a few leading northern ports of America and Europe. Scarcely a barrel of this commodity is now to be seen in these ports, unless landed for trans-shipment to the Roman Catholics of subtropical and tropical countries, which are buying more salt fish than ever as they grow in population. The cod is commercially the most important of fishes. The only reason that makes it so is because salted cod is an extremely popular article of food in all Reman Catholic countries on account of its nutritive quality and cheapness. Protestant countries eat compara-tively little cod and most of that is fresh, instead of cured. When the fishermen of

It is the fresh cod of our iniand fisheries that has supplied most of our markets, while the salted cod of the banks is chiefly sold either in Catholic countries or in lands where that religious element is large. The well known "stockfish" of commerce is the dried cod of Norway and Sweden, and it is shipped at once for the southern parts of Europe. These lands of many fast days also buy the Scottish dried cod.
