Besiew of the Strife Between the Owners of Berds and Flocks. The percential fight between western catlemen and sheepmen is a study for both the psychologist and the economist, writes Captain James H. McClintock in Amslee's Magazine. At first glance the interests of these great divisions of the live stock industry would appear to be in common. But, in truth, this can never be. Cattle and sheep can no more occupy a range in common than oil and water can float coherently. The cowpuncher hates the shepherd with a hatred that is deep and ofttimes picturesque, and the herder begins himself

Sheep, on the contrary, are necessarily nomadic. They are gregarious, "bunching" by instinct. One man with his dog can care for even 4,000, though only half that number is usually allotted. A flock of sheep is about as devastating as a prairie fire. Where it has passed the grass is gone, even to the roots, the sage brush s defoliated and the track so reeks with the sheep's peculiar odor that cattle and horses avoid the ground for weeks afterward. And the berds in their ceaseless journey never follow one another. To use a pat military expression, they come "en echelon," in a path parallel to and abutting one edge of the strip devastated by the preceding woolly army. Thus, if one flock eat out a half mile strip, ten flocks will leave a barren area five miles wide. The better the feed the slower the rate of travel. The flock moves on when the grass is consumed. the forests and the watersheds are the only sections that afford sufficient feed. The struggle between them, therefore, is waged chiefly in what is known as the plateau region of the continent. From lower New Mexico and Arizona and western Texas northward to the American boundary and from the eastern Montana line westward to the summit of the Cascade mountains the the control of the remaining ranges. The sheep go into the verdant meadows of the forests and the cattlemen seek to expel them. The cattlemen occupy some section where the grasses are succulent and the water plentiful, only to find the sheep working into the same district, cropping the grass to its roots and tainting the air with the smell which the cattle cannot en-The closer settlement crowds in upon the formerly unsettled lands the more bitter becomes the antagonism. Frequently it breaks out in brief shooting matches, in which the cattlemen generally prove themselves the more expert. More often it culminates in strained sentiments and press reports of "trouble threatened between
