VOTING CONFINED TO MEMBERS OF PARTY

Democrats Ask to Be Allowed to Participate and State that It is Their Intention to Support Mckinley.

The republican primaries and convention just gone into history afforded the second test of the new primary election law and enabled those who observed its operation to note its strength and weaknesses.

The consensus of opinion seems to be that the primary election law makes an improvement upon the old system because it confines the voting and participation in the construction of the ticket to those who really belong to the party holding th primaries," remarked a politician specially versed in political maneuvering. "For merly the primary convention was a freefor-all race, in which the side won our that could muster up the greatest number of followers without regard to whether perity" can not be denied. they were republicans or democrats. A it is now only pronounced republicans can vote at republican primaries and those managing the various delegations equip nomic independence of the Nebraska hog. themselves with lists of eligible voters and confine their attention to them.

"The law, however, leaves one loopholethat by which the voter may be aworn in by making affidavit before the city clerk and giving adequate reason for not having registered at the prescribed time. In the recent primaries both sides endeavored to avail themselves of the aid of voters district for use as headquarters. Now it specially registered in this manner, although many of the certificates party can do to get desk room in the city ruled out by the election this year. boards because the reasons given did not conform to the requirements of the statute. All this, of course, although necessary to prevent fraud, entailed additional labor upon the election officers and hindered rapid voting.

Hemedies that Suggest Themselves. "The remedy seems to be to have each committee or each governing authority in charge of the party primaries to designate particular time in which transfers may be made at some central location where sworn officers may sit with all the registration books before them. In this way names could be transferred on application from one book to another in advance and then upon the primary election day no one would be allowed to vote if not properly

It was estimated that the proposed line would be about sixty miles long. As such a railroad could not be built for less than perhaps $1,200,000 the committee believed that the issuance of $250,000 to aid the enterprise would be none too little.

Expansion. The trade expansion of the United States

s a matter of pride to all Americans without regard to their personal views on territorial expansion and its political bearings. While trade in general has expanded as never before in the history of our country, its volume can best be understood by the practical illustration furnished by one great concern which has long led the world in its particular branch of business.
