Michael P. Dowling was treated to an entertalement which the students of Creighton university had been preparing to honor the feast of St. Michael, the patron of the president. It was the first appearance this year of the Mandolin orchestra and the first ocasion on which the students appeared as speakers.

After several papers had been read President Dowling made a brief speech, in which he referred to the advantages offered the students for their all-round improvement. He directed the attention of all to the literary, oratorical and musical societies, in which are developed the accomplishments which recommend a young man to public notice.
