If any of the tableware is broken the pieces must be produced, and it is the custom to send them to an auction shop in their damaged condition and sell them to the highest bidder Wornout carpets, window curtains and similar furnishings are disposed of in the same way. Experience has shown that the more fact of association with the White House gives these secondhand articles a greatly enhanced value, and an old bottle or dish which has done duty on the president's table will sell to a collector for more than it cost when new. This is particularly true of the tableware, which has some distinguishing mark upon it, as a broken plate from one of the sets, with the pertrait of the president and the official coat-of-arms. The executive mansion really consists of two separate establishments, one public and the other private. For the public section, a carriage is provided; and when the president is acting as the administrative officer of the government, and wishes to go from the office of the White House hicago Limited Ex... a 6:00 pm a 8:06 am to some other office or department, on government business, he is at liberty to use a Daily. b Daily except Sunday. the official White House carriage. But when he goes driving for pleasure he does so at his own expense. The same rule applies in the entire domestic ecomony of the president's official residence. He hires and pays all the servants, from Mrs. McKinley's maid to the assistant washer of dishes. As a matter of convenience, however, the general management of these affairs is intrusted to the steward. The present incumbent is a colored man, William T. Sinclair, who was brought to Washington by President Cleveland, and who has proved himself so efficient that he has been retained in office. He is said to be as "canny" as a Scotsman, and he looks after things with an eye of exceeding thrift. It is Mr. Sinclair who does the marketng for the president's table. He owns a horse and a light road-wagon, and every morning before the sun is up he climbs into his rig and drives to one of the markets and to the various green-grocer and butcher shops. He feels the bones in the chickens' breasts, thumps the watermelons to test their ripeness, and keeps a wary eye on the huckster while he picks out his best green corn and tenderest celery.
