The United States, launched at Philadelphia July 10, 1797, was the first of these new cruisers and a description of it will apply to the other 44-gun Americans ships of the period. It was built of the finest material for ship construction, with extra heavy timbers and lofty masts. It was armed with 24-pounders in its main deck battery-a kind of gun FORMERLY A JEST, NOW A WONDER freely criticised by the English, who used only 18 pounders on the main deck-and carried a crew of about 460, where English vessels of the same class were manued by a crew of about 350. In short, it was an experiment, sneered at by the British as being top-heavy, overarmed and overmanned, but it was built under the supervision of the commodore who was to command it. Not a long boit was driven or a plank shifted except under the critical eye of its future master, and it proved in the wars with France, Tripoli and England European frigate of the usual dimensions,
