Tinge of Deep Pathos.

There is an infinite pathos in the life and death of J. C. Knopfelt. He was married in Chicago in the later '60s, and at that time was a musician in good standing with the profession. Everything looked prosperous for him then. In the course of time a child was born to them, and the rising young composer was happy. Then came the Chicago fire. Knopfelt's humble home stood directly in the course of the flames. He rescued his wife and babe and was hurrying them to a place of safety when a great brick wall under which they were passing crumbled with the heat, toppled and fell.

When, three weeks later, Knopfelt regained consciousness he found himself in a hospital, and the nurse told him he had undergone a spell of brain fever. On every side were cots, each laden with a victim of the great conflagration. He never saw nor heard of his wife and babe, and conjecture has it that they were numbered with the hundreds of unidentified dead.

With returning health he disposed of his household effects and bought a lot in Rose Hill cemetery, which he dedicated to his dead wife and child.

began drinking, thereby acquiring a habit which during his declining years he lacked the spirit to combat.

for nine years the fashion and wealth of that city reveled in his symphonies. Moved by the exquisite execution of the organist, Henry Ward Beecher, then pastor of the church, would often congratulate him, and during the last few years of the great divine's life a cordial friendship sprang up between them.

Just what brought Knopfelt to Omaha not known. Perhaps the fact he drank leaked that out in Brooklyn and shocked the pious parishoners of Plymouth's congregation. However that may be, he left the City of Churches and came west. For a time he was connected with Kountze Memorial church in the capacity of organist, and then was supplanted by a more temperate, if less talented choir master. After that he eked out a precarlous livelihood by giving music lessons. This, with such income as he was able to realize from royalties on his musical compositions, enabled him to keep up appearances, but little more. Knopfelt was very little appreciated in Omaha, but among his meager effects at the coroner's office are certificates of Boyd theater patrons tomorrow night, is it royalty on some conceptions of exalted some respects quite unlike any of the other sentiment, with a wealth of tender spirituality which youchsafes to them a tenure of life greater than that of their unhappy author.
