Comparative statements of the amount of money different cities spend in maintaining their schools were produced. These comparisons showed that in the year 1895-1900 Omaha spent $31.94 per pupil. This should be welcome information to such of the city's population as delights "commune with nature," for no more picturesque spot can be found within a day's ride of Omaha than Riverview park. It abounds in high bluffs, rugged promonteries, deep, winding gullies and groves of grand old trees. And not the least attractive feature of this reservation to persons of a romantic turn is that it is largely an unexplored tract. Being difficult of access heretofete to the thousands of park frequenters because several blocks of hard valking intervened between it and the car ine it has been varied by comparatively few save ambitious bleyele riders and rab-

Its grass carpets are not littered with the paper box and tin can evidence of picnicing parties, nor has the landscape gardener profuned it with little bridges, minmer houses" or flowerbeds mathe matically correct in outline. A person with an imagination would have no trouble in the first white person to set foot therein,

Within ten minutes, ride on the street ear from the Union depot, Riverview park is a veritable "enchanted domain," with a surprise at every turn, and is about as decisive a change from the urban to the rural as one is likely to find in the middle west, which is generally supposed to be monotonous. But here is variety enough to suit the most fastidious. One moment midst the smoke and smells and noises of the city, the next reveling in primeval bedside of a riece in Omaha, who lay for woods and glades that would make a fit subject of a canvas by Claude. Amid such surroundings one easily forgets that within quarter of a mile is an electric street car line leading to a town where horizontal distance is measured by blocks and vertical distance by floors; 'Riverview' is a happy name for this bit of landscape. To the casual visitor it will not be apparent at first, but if any there be, who doubts that it commands a view of the river let him walk castward that skirts its summit, and then search for the bridle path that leads through it. Let him follow this path, taking care that the until he comes to the summit of a steep houses in the distance. It is from this view that the park takes its name. It is not unlikely that Riverview will become the most popular breathing spot is the city before the close of the coming scason.

Druggist War Continues The cut-rate drug war is still on and the windows of the various drug stores in the ity yesterday contained announcements of that fact. When asked about the fight C. A. Melcher, who does business at Twenty- by fourth and N streets, said that there was a sure enough fight on, and that he proposed to run his business the way he wants to and to run his business the way he wants to and not as others dictate. This is the opinion in the Christ Calling is the topic upon which Rev. Jamison expressed by other druggists, although many apothecaries want to see a cessation of the this morning. apothecaries want to see a cessation of the warfare and a stop put to the cutting of

It is understood that the druggists who first commenced the cut-rate practice did so in order to keep trade from going to department stores in Omaha. All attempts at a truce have been abandoned and it is now marked up as a fight to a finish.
