Result of a Quarrel.

The shooting was the result of a quarrel, the cause of which is not quite clear. The Berry woman made a statement before she was placed on the operating table and showed a disposition to shield Cooney. She said he was discharged several days ago by the Illinois Central railroad and since then had spont much of the time in her company. They were drinking together Thursday in her room. Shortly after 2 o'clock Maggie Steward, the colored chambermald, came in to clean the rooms. Cooney asked the Berry woman to have her leave and to pull down the shades and lock the door. His demands were complied with. The woman asserts that Cooney then drew a revolver from his pocket, saying: "I want to see how this works," and pointed it at her.

"Don't point that at me," she exclaimed "it might go off." She had scarcely finished the words when Cooney fired the shots and ran out.

'I was at her house Tuesday, and when I left I said I was going across the river to cash my check. I did not go back Wednesday, but came over Thursday morning. I took three or four drinks of whisky and then went to her house. We drank beer together all day and at the time of the

Mr. Brooks is so skillful in several styles of verse that it is difficult to say in which he is at his best. His war poems are probably better known than the others. His "Sherman's March" is the finest production which that memorable event has inspired in literature, and is likely to remain so. While he vividly portrays the grandeur and splendor of moving armies, he also depicts the needless misery which they create and leaves the impression which Mr. Brooks himself expresses in the last stanza of "Guns:"

Watch the farmer at his toll-Where great gun-wheels plowed the soil. Flowers blooming? T is much better occupation! T is far better for the nation Than guas booming?

There is in Mr. Brooks' verses a freshness and vividness that rivets the attention of the reader. As General Phil Sherl dun said, "there is in them the dash of the unexpected, like a cavalry charge.
