AGED HERMIT DIES ALONE

William Bakoes, Quiet Character of the River Bottoms, Found Dead in His Hut.

William Bakoes, octogenarian, hermit and maker of wooden shoes, was found dead late Sunday night in his lonely hut at Third and William streets, just south of the Burlington tracks.

Bakoes was a quiet character, and was regarded by the neighbors, especially by the younger generation, with some degree of fear. For many years he has lived alone in the little shack, and was never known to hold any communication with the outside world that was not strictly in the line of his business.

About 6 o'clock Sunday night the son, Daniel, called at his father's hut to take him a basket of provisions. Repeated knocks upon the door failed to elicit a response, and the caller was compelled to climb in through a window.

PROPOSED TRANSIT EXTENSION

Talk of New Line for Special Convenience of South Omaha Shoppers.

The latest street car line to be built upon paper, and one which it is said will soon receive serious consideration by the Omaha Street Railway directory, will connect the residence and office districts of South Omaha with the shopping districts of Omaha.

This line, as planned, would have its southern terminus near the offices of the South Omaha packing houses, and its northern terminus would be in the heart of the retail district of Omaha.

In many places the down-spouts from the roofs of buildings do not connect directly with sewers, but allow water to run across the sidewalk into gutters.

The Darwinian theory is strengthened by many recent events in local drug circles. The monkey is no monopolist as an imitator.

After all we cannot blame the MONKEY nor the MAN for imitating, as the role is an easier one than that of the reformer, sinner or apostate, and the monkey is immensely more amusing and never "jars" the feelings of those who dislike innovations.

We had "rather be right than be president"—and the endorsement which some of "our" friends, the enemy, have given some of our business ideas has been such as to lead us to believe they think we are right.
