public. Frof. Ely said in part:

The first question which suggests itself is this: What do we mean by evolution? Perhaps some of you will recall the definition given by Herbert Spencer. "Evolution," he says, "is a change from ladefinite, incoherent homogeneity to definite coherent heterogeneity, through continuous differentiation and integration." Perhaps you will also recall the pertinent remark of a reviewer that the universe may well have heaved a sigh of relief when, through the cerebration of an eminent thinker it had been delivered of this account of itself. Nevertheless, this definition contains important bolons, and is not, after all difficult to comprehend when one gives it a little thought. There are some points in it to which we shall have occasion to refer. The definition given by Frof. Huxley is a simpler one, namely: "Evolution, or development, is but a history of the steps by which any living being has acquired the morphological and physiological characteristics which distinguish it."

The latter definition seems to have been framed with regard to the individual organism, but the former applies equally well to the individual organism and to development of the social organism. Evolution is biological and when we come to man we must add that it is psychological also, it applies to life, and has its peculiarlities in evolution on account of the existence of mind as a controlling force.

Evolution of Society.

Evolution of Society,

Herbert Spencer's formula is particularly helpful in recalling important points in the evolution of society. We have a change first from homogeneity to heterogeneity. But the homogeneity is only partially organized, its organism is incipient. It is indefinite and incoherent. Early society is little more than a mass of men, a mere mass. The individuals composing it have like occupations, like habits, like beliefs. In a few individuals we see all. But as society develops we notice a growth of differences; the higher the development the groups and within asolicity we have a wast, infinite number of groups and within the groups individuality becomes more marked. A developed society looks like a chaos at first glance, but there is a growing integration, or binding together, accompanying growing differences or differentiation. Individual members of society, as they develop differences, work together more and more perfectly producing one whole, consisting of interdependent parts.

we can hardly say of primitive men that they constitute a society, so imperfect are the ties binding them loosely together. They contain the beginnings of society. Society grows and develops and becomes more vital with every stage in social evolu-

But one fact, one prominent fact, stands out clearer and clearer in all this evolu-tion, and that is that it means increasing co-operation. Co-operation, it now be-comes apparent, is the law of the life of soulery.

society. Social evolution means change. This is up of the most fundamental things which tust be borne in mind. Change in society, a all parts of society, even including what a call the social order itself, is a condition of life. There is no life without hange; the alternative is death. then of life. There is no life without change; the alternative is death.

Changes are sufficiently obvious to one who will contrast the United State of today with the United States of 1890. We have only to look about us to observe a multitude of things essential to our life today which were entirely unknown to the men of 1800. A long list might be made of new things: Street cars, telegraphs, telephones, steam rallways, electric light, etc. will occur to every one. The more we look into the characteristics of our industrial society the more striking appear the changes. In the next place we notice that the changes are ordered changes; they take place in accordance with social laws. There are difficulties in the way of seeing the changes, because, rapid as they are, they are usually slow when compared with the brevity of h man life. So we find men all about us assuming that things in the business world have always been in their present condition, and that they will continue to maintain their present features indefinitely in the future.

To the Trust Stage.

It is still more difficult to see the laws in the changes than it is to see the changes themselves. When great periods are taken together, however, certain stages in development appear. Thus we pass over from the hunting and fishing stage to the pastoral stage, to the agricultural stage, to the modern industrial stage, and finally to the "trust" stage. When we consider the evolution of industrial stage, and inally to the "trust" stage. When we consider the evolution of industrial society with respect to the exchange of goods, we observe the successive use of barter, money and credit and we have three periods, characterized as the barter economy, or truck economy, if you will, the money economy and the credit economy.

if you will, the money economy and the credit economy. When we consider the evolution of labor we notice the transition from slavery to serfdom, to free contract, and from free individual contract to group contract, as manifested in collective bargaining.

These words, characterizing various stages, refer to great periods, and within each of these a multilude of changes has taken place.

Something else is to be noticed also, and that is that social movement is not in a straight line, but more like a curve. We come back to ancient institutions in modified and improved form. We have increasing co-operation and increasing dependence is not burdensome, provided it is may become virtual slavery under the name of freedom. The regulations to preserve freedom. and other social relations existing among men is a condition of freedom. Herbert Spencer, looking at the political regulation of economic relations, speaks of a comfing slavery, but he overlooks the fact that with the increasing dependence of man upon man in modern society this dependence becomes one-sided and results in virtual slavery if these relations are not regulated. This is the explanation of the fact that every civilized faction in the world finds it necessary to regulate to an increasing existing among men. Free contract alone, that is to say, unregulated, can only result in a degrading dependence of some men upon others, and consequently social degradation. On the other hand, through regulated association come freedom and individuality.

Daughters of American Revolution. Have Sons as Guests at Banquet.

The Omaha chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution gave a banquet last right at the Millard hotel to the Nebraska Sons of the American Revolution in commemoration of Forefathers' day. One hundred and fifty guests and members were present, many coming from out in the state. While the guests were served a hidden orchestra played delightful music.

Speech-making occupied the greater portion of the evening and every person who spoke had something to say. No speech was a space-filler, and all were heartily received. Every one, from the address of welcome by Mrs. A. Allee, down to "Amerlea," did himself or herself proud-for in the banquets given by the Daughters of the American Revolution the "Daughters" have a say coming and say it.

The following responded to toasts: "Mary Herbert Spencer's formula is particularly and Martha Washington," G. M. Lambertson, Lincoln: "Then and Now." Mrs. S. C. Dear Sir: I am a widow, 35 years of age, with two children, 13 and 12 years old. I have worked for them for five years, to keep them with me and to keep them in school. But if I could get some good respectable man that will furnish me a good home for me and the children I will appreciate it and make him a good wife. I am a good housekeeper and a good cook and respectable. Will furnish references if necessary. I don't care how old the man is, just so he is not younger than myself.
