TRIUMPHS IN BRIDGING AND TUNNELING

An Artificial River Twenty-Eight Miles Long—Process of Freezing Quicksand—Other Daring Feats.

About the newest of all great engineering structures... the modern railroad bridge, and it is hard to realize that nothing at all like it, even for highway purposes, existed fifty years ago.

Such was the case with the Florence bridge across the Tennessee river in Alabama. There were twelve spans of about 120 feet each, which carried a single track of iron on top of the masonry piers.

When it was finished and track laid on top of it, the under side was lashed to the upper side of the old span and it was additionally suspended from the overhead temporary span by four vertical three and a half-inch steel screw rods.

The difficulty and expense of building solid foundations for a bridge where the water is very deep or swift or the bottom unstable is very great. In soft soils the most effectual is made to prevent any danger of settlement or shifting.

The freezing is accomplished by the use of the modern refrigerating machine. A shaft about ten feet square and 100 feet deep is sunk in this manner through water and quicksand to solid rock at Iron Mountain, Mich., a few years ago.

Chicago's Big Canal. One of the most important, interesting and remarkable engineering feats on this continent was the construction of the Chicago drainage canal, a canal twenty-eight miles long, dug at an expense of over $30,000,000.
