Cleeve, an Englishman who was the first white settler at Portland Me., having settled there as far back as 1622. This remote ancestor of his was a wealthy man, but succeeding generations had lost all the good things of the world old Cleeve gathered around him and Mr. Reed's parents were poor working folk in Portland.

where he remained until 1899, serving for seven years of that time as speaker of the house. Maine has always had influential men in congress, and has ever followed the southern custom of keeping good men when it got them there, and Reed was no exception to the old rule.

These, the early days of his life, are full of incidents which the old folk of Portland still delight to tell concerning the man who was afterward in the running for the presidential nomination.

Senator Gamble will oppose. Senator Gamble, speaking today of the action of the house committee on Indian affairs, said that the abandonment of agents at Indian agencies would work evil instead of good to the tribes of Indians interested.

He was a young man then, untired and inexperienced, and had to meet much opposition on this score. Still the experiment proved such a success that he was continued in various offices until advancing years, in 1899, took him out of the political arena again and relegated him to the gallery of honored ones whose fighting days were over, but whose services were gratefully remembered in more countries than one.
