OMAHA PUBLIC SCHOOLS

With some question abroad as to the economy practiced in the conduct of the public schools not a few of the principals and teachers have taken the matter home to themselves, so to speak, and have made an estimate of the supplies used in their schools with a view to curtailing, if that can be done, and as a result the most of them are proud of their record and feel that it can hardly be improved upon.

This is especially true regarding the text books. The generally soiled and dilapidated condition of some of the books indicates, it is true, that they have had hard and even careless use, but a comparison reading shows these to be exceptions, while the books that have been in use for a number of years.

It is estimated by one principal that the ordinary text books bought last for eight years and ten supplementary readers and books twice that length of time, she basing her estimate upon what has been done in her own building, which includes children from the middle and some of the poorer classes.

The same care is exercised with other things. Though a large proportion of the every day work above the fifth grade is being done with pen and ink, it has been estimated by a number of principals that the children average one pen in three weeks.
