

of one distinguished dead, J. Sterling Morton. It is not necessary that I should speak. Other people have covered the ground and draw lessons from it. I should like to say that the late Mr. Morton was a man of high character and high ability. He was a man of high character and high ability. He was a man of high character and high ability.

and spoke briefly of Mr. Morton as a friend and neighbor and also as a public man. Representative Jones of Otoe had also known Mr. Morton for thirty years as a neighbor and he, too, dwelt for a few minutes on the deceased in his relations with those who knew him as a friend. He paid a glowing tribute to him likewise as a statesman, logician, scholar and gentleman.

Representative McClay of Lancaster was the next speaker. He made an eloquent appeal for the sentiments of the audience in honoring the man, to whom he referred as "statesman, scholar, logician, gentleman, the grandest Roman of them all." J. Sterling Morton had, he said, honored the state of Nebraska as had been given to few men to do. He was one of its early pioneers and had contributed incalculably to the progress and honor of his adopted state in every epoch of its history. His name and memory lived in the affections of all who knew him. His fame and popularity extended beyond the limits of his own state and were national and even international.

Representative Spurluck of Cass, whose father in the early periods of Nebraska history was one of Morton's earliest opponents, but who later relations with him were friendly, paid the late statesman a cordial and eloquent tribute. He spoke especially of the high moral character of Mr. Morton and of his great work for the state. Representative Sears of Burt was the next speaker. He spoke of the late Mr. Morton as a man of high character and high ability. He was a man of high character and high ability. He was a man of high character and high ability.
