tion.

He noted that trusts had grown up contemporaneously with the protetive system, and declared his belief that American organizations would come to grief through overcapitalization, so that what harm they did would be readjusted. The remedy for the "trust menace" to foreign markets he saw in raising tariffs in the countries affected, and the levying of countervailing duties.

M. des Essars praised American workmen, who, he said, compensated for the higher wages they received by giving their employers a larger output. He concluded by expressing his opinion that the inability of the American national banks to control a financial crisis could be remedied by the adoption of the procedure followed by the Bank of France.
