Mr. Kellogg maintained that it would be Impossible to estimate the amount of damage to the Great Western by the delay, from the fact that the road would be stopped at Council Bluffs without any terminals and the resultant damage would be incalculable and unobtainable.

Judge Munger stated that it would be impossible to arrive at the question of damages sustained to the Great Western by delay, because there would be no way of estimating the amount of freight or passenger traffic that the road might be deprived of, or if any, . For this reason would leave the question of a supersedas bond to the appellate court, and not require one in this case.

Mr. Kellogg stated that the Union Pacific would not be daringed at all, and that it would be properly compensated for the uses of its tracks; bridge and terminals. He asked for a modification of the order dissolving the injunction during the pendency of the appeal.
