Miss Jessie Ralph One doesn't go to see "Resurrection" with any notion of being entertained; at least, if one does, the notion is dispelled very shortly after the curtain goes up on the first act. Familiarity with the Tolstoy novel doesn't sufficiently prepare the auditor for the terrible realism, the exact counterpart of living misery, degradatio, and squalor presented on the stage. Tolstoy drew with master strokes the picture of sin in its most repulsive and dorbidding colors. He doesn't exaggerate, nor does he spare the truth. In fact, it is the truth seeks to set forth, and he has done it, fearlessly and faithfully. For it is no fancy ploture he has conjured up to gild a remance. It is a chapter from life, not the life of an individual probably, but a composite picture of the lives of many, and one whose fidelity is admitted by the worldly-wise. The dramatists have faithfully set forth the Tolstoy iden. The central thought of the novelist has been preserved intact in the drama, something all but novel in the matter of book plays. But all of this is vain if not driven home with convincing force, and this force is supplied by the artist who enacted the role of Katusha Maslova at the Boyd Saturday. A part without attraction other than the scope it gives for the manifestation of ability as an actress. Miss Waleh endows the character with a reality that is all but intolerable. The change from her appearance in the prologue, a bright. happy girl, in whose veins the full-blooded current of life bounds unfettered, carried away by her ecstacy of love, to her appearance in the second act, a sodden creature of the streets, despondent, desperate, hopeless in her degradation and bent only on drowning in the lowest of dissipation's dregs what is left of her animal existence, is a positive shock. And Miss Walsh ren ders it still more shocking by her painful fidelity to detail-an essential attribute to realism, the basis and life of the whole piece. It is a relief when the curtain falls on this act, rendered the more grateful by the thought that the soul has been kindled anew. In the third and fourth acts the character becomes essentially ideal, illustrating the possibilities rather than the actualities, and the theme takes on a more hopeful turn. It is here that Miss Waish gives the most pleasing exhibition of her ability, and at the end of the fourth act, when she resolutely sets her face against the desires of her heart, and bravely looks forward to a new life, she reaches a climax, so quiet, so unobtrusive, so subdued, after the revolting scenes that have passed before, that it almost seems that a lost one has in reality been reclaimed, and that the whole thing has been actual and not mimlery.

Miss Walsh's support is good enough to illustrate the meaning of the play, without reaching the limit of its possibilities. Mr. Von Mitzel seems ill at ease in the role of Dmitri, as though he didn't really like to do the part, although it is one offering splendid opportunities to an actor. The stage settings are of a part with the text, and add much to the realistic effects achieved through the efforts of the grea artist. Two very large audiences watched the play Saturday. It would hardly be true to say that they were liberal in their applause, but the silence was that of thought and not of indifference, and that is the highest tribute that can be paid the piece.
