A MESSAGE FROM HENRY

By A. M. Davies Ogden.

(Copyright, 1903, by A. M. Davies Ogden.)

The whole trouble was caused by the fact that at the last moment Henry confided the matter to Nicholas. Therefore, it was Henry's own fault, for who else would have trusted a person known in the family by the soubriquet—well deserved, too—of "The Terror." Fancy anyone being such an ass. Henry was 34 and cautious, as against Nick's 25 years and reckless spirits. Henry was susceptible and flirtatious, to Nick's scorn of girls and openly expressed preference for men's society, and Henry never would stand up for anything if he could help it, while Nick defied the whole world to come on. I know; for I'm sister to them both.

All that winter Henry had been quite devoted to Letty Ferris, one of the season's prettiest debutantes. Really he had been nice to her in every possible way, and though I cannot see what she wanted in such an old man, she appeared to like it extremely. "Encouraged him," mother declared one day. But Henry pooh-poohed the idea.

"Debutantes are not dangerous," he said; "they scatter their attentions so widely. They are not bent on getting married like the older girls. And besides, they all know that I am a confirmed old bachelor."

As Lent drew near, however, Henry began to get nervous. Girls were sometimes unreasonable creatures. And then one night at dinner he announced that he was sailing on the next Saturday. We all exclaimed, even father, and Nick laughed.

He who courts and runs away,
May live to court another day,

he quoted disrespectfully. "Eh, Henry?"

But Henry got quite stuffy and said that there was nothing extraordinary in his going away. Everybody went in March. It was the proper thing to do.

So Nicholas and I went down to see Henry off. I think that he was half sorry when he really got on board the ship, he fidgetted so. He always did hate the water. And his stateroom did look so small. Just as the bell rang for us to go ashore he called Nick back and said something in a low voice. I heard Nick answer "all right," and then we started to descend the steep gangway. Half way down Nick stopped and looked back to where Henry stood leaning over the rail. "Shall I write something on the card?" he yelled.

"Anything you like," shouted Henry.

That's how the thing started, and I think it was very imprudent of Henry. But I suppose he hadn't time to think, and Nicholas fairly pulled me away so that Henry might not have a chance to change his mind before it was too late.

"Come along, Kid," said Nick, as we left the dock—it's most undignified to be called "Kid" when you're nearly fifteen, I know, but what can you do with Nick—and then he called a hansom and told the man to drive to Thorley's.

"I want to see your freshest violets," he said to the flower-man. And they were just lovely, so sweet and fragrant. I hope that someone will send me violets when I'm grown up. But mother says little girls shouldn't think of such things. Well, Nick picked out six great purple bunches, next he produced one of Henry's cards—heavens knows from where—and wrote something on it in a little backhanded writing just like Henry's. Then he ordered the whole lot sent to Letty. How pleased she must have been.

In those days Nicholas did not know Letty, he went out so little and then only under compulsion. But now that Henry was gone, Madge insisted that Nicholas must take her about, and consequently before very long he met Letty. It was at some dance, and I expect it must have been during supper—for Madge says that during the dancing Nick only stands in the doorway and looks bored. Any way he was cross as you like next morning. And as time went on, and Letty and Madge struck up quite an intimacy, he only seemed to get crosser and crosser.

"I expect it's on Henry's account," explained Madge. "She always blushes when I mention him, and the other day asked me for his address. Do you suppose that he is serious this time? Or is it only that she thinks so?"

Nicholas kicked the fire angrily.

"Hasn't she told you anything?" he asked sharply.

"Not a word."

"But I thought that girls always told each other everything."

"Nonsense," sniffed Madge. "Not Letty's kind anyway. But do you think that Henry is really serious?" going back to her point.

'Henry's a cad," burst out Nick suddenly. Then, as Made and I stared, surprised, he quieted down a bit. "I mean," he explained carefully, "that Henry may some day go too far and hurt somebody's feelings." Henry's sister laughed.

"It seems odd to think of anybody's taking Henry seriously," she scoffed. "But girls are geese."

"Well, I'll bet Miss Ferris isn't," declared Nick, "and if she believes in Henry it's somebody's fault. And thoughtlessness is no excuse, either," he added, giving the fire another vicious poke. I had never seen Nicholas so upset.

"You ought to know something about it," remarked Madge. "You've seen a good deal of her lately. Are you trying to take Henry's place?"

"Henry's place, indeed," cried Nicholas. 'Henry's," and without another word he turned and dashed out of the room like a young tornado, slamming the door behind him. Madge smiled in her superior way.

"What a temper that boy has. I pity the woman who gets him."

"Nicholas is a brick," I retorted hotly, "and worth a dozen of you and Henry." But she only laughed the more. Madge can be awfully aggravating.

A few days later came a letter for Nicholas from Henry, at which he looked first surprised, then furious. About two weeks later another letter came, and this time he strode off to the library before opening it. I was dying to follow, but didn't quite dare. When, at last, fortifying myself with the thought that it was only Nick, I ventured to open the door, the sight of the dejected looking figure in the big chair made me forget everything else. Running to him I flung my arms around his neck.

"What is it, Nickie?" I asked, giving him a sympathetic hug. Nicholas tried to smile.

"Nothing, Kid. Don't strangle me," he responded, patting me on the back, "It's only Henry."

"Is he mad?" I demanded. Nicholas stared.

"About what?"

"Why—about the flowers," said I, timidly.

"The flowers! What do you know about the flowers?" he began, then he remembered. "Oh, you were with me."

"Tell me, Nick," I begged. "You know I never repeat things. Did Letty write to him?"

"Yes," groaned Nicholas.

"And Henry?"

"Henry's frightened," said Nick, bitterly. "Frightened! Good Lord!"

"What did Letty say?"

"Thanked him for the violets, it seems, and then added that she would answer his message when he came home. So he wrote to ask what the deuce I had said. And now—now he writes that he won't come home; says I have got him into the scrape and that I must get him out. And after I told him that he must come—" broke off Nick despairingly. I looked at him in surprise.

"Why, do you think Letty cares for him?" I questioned. Nicholas sighed.

"I'm afraid so."

"Perhaps she doesn't," I hazarded. But Nick shook his head.

"I can't hope for that. Even Madge thinks so. And it's all my fault, too, sending that cursed message. It was a low trick and I ought to be shot for it."

"But she wouldn't have fallen in love with Henry just through a message," I objected sensibly.

"No. But it might bring things to a climax. By believing he cared she might let herself care."

"I don't believe people 'let' themselves fall in love," I persisted. "Was it a lovery message?"

"It might have been taken to mean a lot or nothing," said Nick uncertainly. "She seems to have taken it the first way."

"Then there is only one thing to do. You must tell her the whole truth," said I positively. Nicholas jumped.

"Don't talk nonsense," he exclaimed, irritably. But I insisted.

"It's not nonsense," I declared. "If she really understood—why, she's get over it at once, I know she would." Nicholas looked stunned.

"Ought I?" he whispered. "Must I?" Then he squared his shoulders as he always did before anything unpleasant to be faced. "I will think about it, Kid," he answered. And with that I had to be content. But I wished he would tell her. It didn't seem fair.

Late that afternoon I was in the library reading, and as the light waned I perched behind the curtain in the big window to get the last rays. I know its bad to read by a fading light and all that, but I was interested and I forgot. From the drawing room, where Madge had some girls for tea, came the murmur of tongues, but I paid no heed, and it must have been some time later, when the light was almost gone, that I realized that there were two people talking inthe library. I could not have said how long they had been there and I dare not move, for I recognized the voices of Nick and Miss Ferris and feared that my sudden appearance might cause trouble. Besides I knew that I had no business there anyway. I tried putting my fingers to my ears—I'm no sneak—but the words would force their way. I caught Nick's voice first and took a furtive glance.

"I—I want to tell you something," he was saying and his voice sounded queer. "And yet I don't know that you will ever forgive me. Thought, perhaps my—. It's—It's something about Henry," he went on, "you see, he—that is, I—" The girl started and glanced up swiftly.

"If your brother has anything to say to me cannot he say it himself?" she asked, with some spirit. Nicholas groaned.

"But it's my fault," he stammered, "so even at the risk of your anger—oh, I have acted like a cad," he burst out suddenly, "and I cannot hope that you will ever forgive me. But—. You remember the day that Henry sailed, the flowers you received—and the message?"

"Yes," murmured Letty. She had grown very white. "Yes, go on."

"It—it was not Henry who sent them," confessed Nick desperately. "It was I. I meant it as a joke on Henry, I never thought of you. And then, when I met you. Ah, don't look so. I've written to him, I've told him to come home; he will, he must. Don't look so, please," he begged. Letty, her lips quivering pitifully, lifted wide grieved eyes.

"You," she whispered. "You! And I thought. But why should he come back. What do you mean?"

"Why—why didn't you expect him?" blundered Nicholas too earnestly to be tactful. "Don't you care for him then?" a flash of hopefulness illuminated his face. "Don't you?" The girl, trembling and indignant, flung up her head.

"I—care for him," she crief, her voice shaking. "And he thinks so, too. Oh!" with a sharp little cry of distress. "You are quite mistaken," she went on after a pause. "I care nothing for your brother," with icy precision. Nicholas drew a long breath.

"I—I'm mighty glad to hear it," he said sincerely, "he's not half good enough for you. No one is for that matter, but—"

"Glad," interrupted the girl with passionate haste, "glad! You are not half so glad as I am. How I would hate, hate to be connected with—with any of your family,' she ended fiercely. Nicholas took a hasty step forward.

"You mean that," he demanded unsteadily. "You really mean that. You cannot forgive me then."

Letty, who had hidden her face, remained silent and Nicholas watched her with wistful eyes, till suddenly to his consternation, the girl broke into a perfect storm of tears. The sound of her weeping seemed to drive away his last remnant of self-control.

"Letty!" he cried frantically. "Letty!" The girl, sobbing harder than ever, retreated a pace.

"How dare you call me Letty?" she gasped. "You have no right. I forbid it."

"Miss Ferris then. Only stop, please stop. I will go away. I will do anything, only stop. Oh, Letty, can't you forgive me, do try. You say you don't care for Henry."

"No."

"Then there is such a splendid way to prove it to him. Only you'd have to forgive me."

"But I won't," came the voice, still muffled behind the handkerchief.

"Well, don't forgive me then. But marry me anyway. That will show Henry his mistake."

"Marry you!"

"Just give me a chance," begged Nicholas. "With you to reform me I'd be a perfect angel. Won't you try it? Since you won't be my sister, won't you. Ah, Letty, won't you be my wife?"

"Marry you, when a moment ago you wanted me to marry your brother," sobbed the voice, still unconvinced.

"Wanted you to!" cried Nicholas. "Wanted! Oh, Letty, you cannot imagine how I suffered at even the idea of your marrying any other man. For I love you so dearly, sweetheart. Surely you know that, you must know it; everybody else does. But your happiness came first and for that—. But you say you don't care for him: then isn't there a chance, just the least chance for me? Do you, can you love me, even the smallest bit? Letty," in his excitement he gave her a little shake. "Answer me, Letty!"

That night Nicholas and I composed a letter to Henry:

Dear Henry: I am sure that you will be interested to learn of Miss Ferris' engagement. While not yet formally announced, she wishes her old friends to know of it, and, of course, you.

The Kid is perfectly delighted, as she is to be bridesmaid; already she and Madge and Letty are quarreling over the shapes of the hats, but the wedding is not to take place until June, for although I cannot see anything unlucky in May—except, perhaps, its length—girls are superstitious.

I hope you will be back by then and ready to act as best men, for the groom, I believe I forgot to tell you, is your tremendously lucky brother. NICHOLAS.

But he never would have told her if it hadn't been for me.

Drug Store Merchandise and Medicine

High in Quality--Low in Price

The "SYSTEM" upon which we have built up a drug business—which is the largest of any retail drug store in the Transmississippi states—is a very simple one. First of all, WE HAVE the goods which our patrons wish. Second, the goods we offer are always the "GENUINE" and "ORIGINAL" ones—no imitations nor goods of doubtful purity. Third, our prices are ALWAYS the LOWEST OBTAINABLE—quality considered—WE WILL NOT BE UNDERSOLD. Fourth, an adequate service at all times.

The Best Paints Made

The SHERWIN-WILLIAMS PAINTS are fairly entitled to this description, because wind, rain or sun, separately or collectively, do not affect them—wind does not bleach, rain does not "wash" or "chalk," sun does not fade. For these reasons and hundreds of others the Sherwin-Williams Paints have for 50 years stood as the standard for high grade paint—other makers have TRIED to make AS GOOD—NONE HAVE SUCCEEDED.

The cost of these goods is just about the same as that asked for grades of indifferent quality. GET THE BEST—buy Sherwin-Williams PAINTS, ENAMELS, VARNISHES, Wood Fillers, Barn Paints.

IT COMES IN HUGE CANS and barrels—for cars, barns and dwellings—or in cute little pots and cans for the small decorating jobs of the housewife.

Floors painted with Sherwin-Williams Floor Paints dry hard enough to walk on in ONE NIGHT. Call for color card.
