The idea of the problem was that the supply train was to be hurried through to an imaginary body that had been cut off from its supplies. A force under Lieutenant Colonel Kingsbury of the Eighth cavalry was to attack this train and hold it until an imaginary force coming up in the rear should enable him to capture the train. He held it for a length of time sufficient, in the opinion of the umpires, for his reinforcements to arrive.

Although Lieutenant Colonel Loughbor ough lost a number of wagons, his infantry was steadily pressing forward, driving back Lieutenant Colonel Kingsbury's men and inflicting heavy damage upon him. As usual in the maneuvers, the problem came to a close just as the hard fighting was about to commence.

Lieutenant Colonel Loughborough was to be at the north line of the reservation with the head of his column at 10 o'clock. He was allowed one-half hour march from this line before Lieutenant Colonel Kingsbury should march against him. Lieutenant Colonel Loughborough was on the line at the appointed time.
