SEASONABLE FASHIONS

Blouse Walst, 406-The uniot that gives long lines at the front has certain adfar better than any other can ever do. This one combines that effect with the long line from shoulder to cuff that is so much in vogue and is exceedingly grapeful white peau de cynge and the trimming Teneriffe lace, but all the season's waistings and dress materials, that are soft enough to allow of tucking, are equally odd waist and the entire gown. The narrow vest-like effect obtained by the lace is peculiarly good and the tucks at the shoulders provide the soft folds over the bust that are always so satisfactory.

The waist consists of the smoothly fitted lining, the fronts and the back. The back is plain, drawn down in gathers at the waist line, but the fronts are tucked at the shoulders and laid in box plaits near the center. The sleeves are full below the elbows and snug above and are finished with narrow cuffs. The closing is made invisibly beneath the box plait.

LETTERS TO SANTA

Quaint Missives Opened at Washington by Cerks of Dead Letter Office.

FAITH OF CHILDHOOD IN GOOD OLD KRISS

office in the state" stamped on the er velope. Technically, "Santa Claus letters, as they are called, come under the head of "fictitious" mail matter, and those which are directed to such impossible places as "Snow Land" or "Arctic Regions" are so marked at the local postoffices and forwarded direct to the Dead Letter office.

Entitled to Privacy. It is held by the Postoffice department that such children's letters are entitled to as ordinary first-class mail enjoys. in the myth, but because they have no anxieties as to the gratification of their wants. They know that when Christmas comes they are sure to get whatever they desire, and it is not worth their while to bother with petitions.

When the writer was himself a little boy he was told that the chimneys of the houses of the poor were so narrow that Santa Claus could not make his way down them, and so was obliged to carry his toys and other gifts elsewhere. It was a pathetic and pleturesque way of expressing the idea of the res angusta domi which forbids many of the best blessings of life to those who cannot afford to buy them.

In order to recover damages for an alleged delay in the shipment of live stock. It is necessary to introduce some completent evidence tending to abow the length of time ordinarily required to transport the shipment from the place where received to the point of deivery and that a longer time was actually consumed than ment of cattle, described in his mortgage, and other gifts elsewhere. It was a pathetic and pleturesque way of expressing the lade of the res angusta domi which forbids many of the best blessings of life to those who cannot afford to buy them.

Where the Letters Land and What is Done with Them.

The faith of childhood in Santa Claus and his gifts makes a good deal of business for the Postoffice department during the Christmas season.

Liftle boys and girls know only two ways of communicating with the folly Christmas god—by the chimney and by mail. A letter, dropped into the fireplace just before bedtime, may be expected to reach him. The smoke, when the fire is lighted, will carry it up the fue; or, it it is not safely conveyed in that fashion, Kriss Kringle will come for it. In fact, a mere list of toys and other articles desired, when similarly deposited, as mere list of toys and other articles desired, when similarly deposited, will accomplish the purpose in view.

But these are days when postal facilities are employed much more generally and widely than was the case fifteen or twenty years ago, and the channel of communication with Santa Claus by chimney has been to a great extent abandoned, the every-day mails being preferred on account of their greater promptness and sureness of delivery, Hence it comes about that, at Christmastide each year, thousands of missives addressed by children to their patron saint are dropped into post boxes of delivery, Hence it comes about that, at Christmastide each year, thousands of missives addressed by children to their patron saint are dropped into post boxes of delivery, Hence it comes about that, at Christmastide each year, thousands of missives addressed by children to their patron saint are dropped into post boxes of delivery, Hence it comes about that, at Christmastide each year, thousands of missives addressed by children to their patron saint are dropped into post boxes of delivery, Hence it comes about that, at Christmastide each year, thousands of missives addressed by children to their patron saint are dropped into post boxes of delivery, Hence it comes about that, at Christmastide each year, thousands of missives addressed by children to their patron saint are dropped into post boxes of delivery. they reach, the Dead Letter office they go through the regular course of procedura, being opened, examined for valuable oon tents—once in a while small sums of money are found in them—and returned to the senders in case (as often happens) their addresses are appended. If they lack stamps, as is frequently the case—for missives of the kind are liable to be dropped into the post-box "on faith" and without preparament—the writers, if practicable, are notified. The letters whose senders cannot be reached are burned.

"I would like a woolly dog on wheels, and he barks. I do not care for the alive one. I have a woolly dog on wheels, and he barks. I do not care for the alive one unless he can bark, too."

This is an example of the kind of letter that is dedicated by the child to a sympathining parent, who takes it down verbatim, addresses it to the North Pole, or Peking, China, and shows the youngster how to drop it into the mailbox on the nearest corner. When, on Christmas day, the woolly dog makes his appearance, it is obvious that the communication must have been received by Santa Claus, and no further questions are asked.

Most Santa Claus letters are dictated in his was the coinfidential missive of a small was thington girl, who wrote:

"Please bring me a doll and some coand, it like candy. Dear Santa Claus, bring me come green candy. Mild G street. That is all."

Now, why should this little girl have preferred green examy. Was it because she had found green sweetmeats more toothed in a great and the sant of printing words, to forward their petitions in autograph. Done in large angular letters, last Christmas, was the coinfidential missive of a small washington girl, who wrote:

"Please bring me a doll and some coand, il like candy. Dear she and the preferred green candy. Was it because she had found green sweetmeats more toothed was to printing words, to forward their petitions of a small washington girl, who wrote:
