Car Shortage Continues,

South Omaha packers are still com plaining about the shortage of refrigerator cars. It is stated here that many of the ears are snowbound in the east and cannot he sent west until there is a decided change the weather and the snow melts. This shortage of cars is severely feit by the ackers, as large orders are being held ok on account of the inability of the rafiroads to furnish suitable cars. Last week one of the packers secured twentyeight ordinary box cars and had these cars racked so that sides of beef could be hung the same as in refrigerator cars. Piano Virtuoso Arrives in Omaha for scheme worked all right until Friday, when the temperature rose. These box cars, said an official of one of the packing companies, can be operated all right as long as the temperature remains between zero and thirty degrees above. Should the temperature rise above the thirty mark the beef would be spoiled. Local packers are again bidding for extra mess beef for the Russian government. Those who are bidding look for the leting of another large contract sometime this week. The packers here are in good shape to handle large foreign orders at his time, the only drawback being the lack of cars. Railroad men here say every effort is being made in the east to get

MALEK ON HIS FIRST VISIT

His Recital at Boyd's Tomorrow Night.

Ottakar Malek, the Bohemian piano viruoso, who appears at the Boyd tomorrow night, arrived in Omaha yesterday evening. This is his first visit to Omaha on his built. first tour of America. It is his second recital in Nebraska, though, for he gave one at Lincoln Tuesday night and won no end music of that musically inclined city. Malek toured Europe very thoroughly and thrilled the old continent with his marvelous work. He made one very extensive and very successful tour with Jan Kubeilk, the violin virtuoso with whose than 250 years ago in old New York on the wonderful performances Omaha simply fell in love, and indeed the European press was fully as flattering in its accounts of Malek as of Kubelik. The ardent friends of the former claim even more so. It is enough that this prodigy of planism has captivated people wherever he has been.

CAREER OF BEER INDUSTRY

METZ BREWERY FIRST TO START HERE

Krug and Columbia, Later Owned by Store & Her, Followed Closely in Removing Sands of the Desert.

The depth of lager beer consumed annually in the United States has considerably increased since sixty years ago, when started in New York and Philadelphia. Before 1844 very few persons in the United States knew the taste of lager; now very few do not. Small shipments were made from Europe for the upper thirty-three of that time, but the general public looked upon this beer as distilled gold and was ontent with a very much less expensive cooler. English beer and ale have been made in this country since the beginning. but lager is of so recent date that at least twelve of the original breweries are still in operation.

The first brewery in Omnha was Metz brothers. It also was the first in the state and among the first manufacturing ventures of any sort in this young growth of wool, and little else. In 1856 it was begun by a man named McCumbe, who ran it until 1861, when he sold out to Joseph Bauman and John Green. It passed through several hands and in 1864 became the property of Metz Bros, at a cost of $6,500. The brewing capacity at that time was about wenty-one barrels a day. In 1858 fifty barrels were turned out every twenty-four hours. About four years ago the present plant was completed, increasing the production three or four-fold. The plant always has been at Sixth and Leavenworth

The tea to have been given February 19 by Mrs. D. L. Holmes, Mrs. George Smith and Mrs. Schafer for the benefit of the Ladles' Alid society of the Presbyterian church has been indefinitely postponed.

The local porth butchers' union will have the English say, it must have been "small" the English say, it must have been "small beer." Three hundred barrels a year caused overtime operations. In 1995 it moved to Eleventh and Jackson streets and buildings were put up making it the most exensive in the state. The desert proposition began to disappear from the more up-todate maps of that day. About ten years ago the present location, just at the northern boundary of South Omaha, was selected and the buildings erected. The Columbia brewery was the third missionary enterprise begun in this city and got busy in 1863 so as to welcome back the boys in blue." On the death of Mr. Bauman, Gottleib Stors and Joseph Her took charge of it and in the early '90s the present Storz plant on Sherman avenue was

The other Omaha brewery, the Willow Springe, is an infant as far as age goes, but manages to turn out some beer neverof praise and plaudits from the lovers of theless. It was begun eight years ago by Joseph Pritchard and others, but changed hands afterward.

Abrand of beer never drunk in Omaha was that from the vats of old Governor Van Twiller, who put up a place more farm of the West India company, which was on the west side of the town near Hudson street. The ancestors of the Omaha people who turned their back on this brand of beer are now drinking cologne and red ink in the vicinity of Tichimingo. Another brewery started out salesmen from they did not brew lager beer or hopped malt beer.

Birthplace of Lager Beer. Philadelphia and New York each claim to be the proper marks for the plaudits of the birth places of the first American lager. The Philadelphia hop juice factory house had its plant at Nineteenth and ence must command attention before he Broadway, where a grand carpet store now stands

The books of this first New York brewery are still in existence and are interesting. Sebastian Sommers was the owner, where he made ale and small beer, but not lager. He sold the place before the reformation. J. F. Luther was the first cus tomer and on September 3, 1843, he bought five gallons of beer and paid for it 50 cents. or 10 cents a gallon. People of those days could hardly afford to stay sober, in which condition they would need food, fire and hearthstone. At that time a brewery did given with implicit confidence. It is a retail business and the customer would call for his beer and take it home with him in a pail or a tub. Peter Stoltz was the second customer and he bought ten gallons. Not so had for those old times. Ten gallons of beer would be too heavy a load for any man to carry home in a pail, but a good man might manage it in some manner. Daniel Tiemann and W. F. Havemeyer, afterward mayor of New York City. were among the first customers. Lager the big cantilever bridge here, built by beer was a novelty and it soon became a fashionable drink, as the names on the books of the old brewery show. When the minister was coming up to the house for dinner the really swell families would bring in a can to mark the event as one of consequence. It was not a cheap and popular drink, and whisky, being untroubled by internal revenue or other complaints, was the poor man's drink. Some time apparently was required for New Tork to get its lager habit on and the owners with two or three hands used to turn out only about $10 or $15 worth of drink a day, which was called for with a can. In a few years sufficient thirst and interest had been aroused so that a bigger plant was put up a few blocks further out and the first lager beer saloon opened. People used to drive out into the suburbs to taste the new drink. Ice it was, however, that was the making of beer. Until its introduction in general use the beer was kept in the underground vaults and most of it brewed and drunk in the winter months. When ice was discovered to be useful as well as smooth a summer business was begun which has laid the dust of many a heated spell since that time. It was not until years after the brewing of lager that it became customary to put it in kegs and barrels.

In it he assumes the role of romantic hero, and exhibits a talent as a comedian that one who knows him only as a serious, classic actor, would never suspect. It was MOORS COMING TO THE FAIR very well received. In the evening Mr. Whiteside played

'Hamlet," and showed again the effect of his careful study of the part. It is not a reflection on his former efforts to say that he is continually improving his presentation of this great character. He finds each new time an opportunity to further illuminate the immortal lines of the great drams, and he does it with force and vigor, but always with vigor. For example, in the scene with the queen-mother, after the play has 'trapped the conscience of the king," he played his part last night as he of the nature of Hamelt towards his mother, whom he loved as he did his as that of his uncle. In this he was so good as to receive several curtain calls. Miss Morse, as Queen Gertrude, rose to the oceasion also, and quite shared with the star the honors of a very effective bit of acting. Miss Wolstan fairly won the large audience as Ophelia, her mad scene getting her earnest plaudits for the rare good tasts she displayed in its difficulties. Others in the company are well located, and the staging of the piece is, as it has always been under Mr. Whiteside's care, most satisfactory. The engagement was only for the
