This contract was introduced as having been carried out by the parties in interest. Dutton then told of the bitterness existing between citizens residing in the two sections of the city referred to above. In fact nearly every witness has taken occasion to tell of the rivalry existing between the east and west sides of Hastings, so that when Mr. Dutton began to corroborate other witnesses along these lines Senator Hoar remarked that the committee would take judicial knowledge of that fact that there was much acrimony in Hastings over the location of the postoffice and that this committee, some of whom had persons knowledge of just such fights in their own states.

Politically, Mr. Dutton said, that he wa a democrat and that he voted against Dietrich when he was a candidate for governor; that, in fact, he had held a position on ex-Governor Poynter's staff when the latter was governor of Nebrasks and Dietrich's predecessor. Personally, Dietrich and himself were friends, both striving for building up of the section in which their property was located. The witness said that it had been the practice of citizens to club together and raise money to help pay rent of the building occupied by the postoffice in order that the postoffice might be kept on the east side. Daughter Gets Rent.

Probably the most important witness at today's session was John Slaker, brotherin-law of Senator Dietrich, and cashier of the bank in Hastings, of which Senator Dietrich is president. Mr. Slaker's testimony, although summoned by the prosecution, was in all essential particulars in the interest of Senator Dietrich. Under the examination of Senators Hour, Platt and Spooner, the whole story of Dietrich's connection with the location of the postoffice in his building came out. He said that Miss Gertrude Dietrich, daughter of the Atlantic. the senator, had inherited from her grandfather between $4,000 and $5,000 and that this amount had been paid to Senator Dietrich, who used it in the erection of the Says United States Will Not Interfere Dietrich building, the witness having been toil by Senator Dietrich that it was the latter's intention to deed the lot and building to his daughter upon the completion of the structure.
